AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CHILTON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $225,000 for payment of interest to owners of lots, pieces, or parcels of land, or to their heirs or legal representatives, which were included in the report and award of the court commissioners to the District docket case, No. 1046, to condemn lands for the enlargement of the Capitol Grounds, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I am not going to call for a quorum, but before that motion is put, I desire to say that I have done what I could to avoid the immense and, as I think, absolutely unjustifiable extravagance of this session of Congress. Believing, as I do, in an ample and adequate Army and Navy, yet in view of the steady day by day weakening and depleting of the great nations of Europe, exhausting themselves in men, resources, and credit, it has seemed to me that this was not a time to make these extraordinary and unnecessary appropriations, entailing such a burden and requiring additional expenditures in the future. However, as it is bound to pass, I shall not call for a yea-and-nay vote, but I simply want to say that if there were a yea-and-nay vote called for, I would vote "nay" on the question of the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask for the adoption of the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 18, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATION.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate August 17 (legislative day of August 16), 1916.

DIRECTOR OF THE MINT.

F. J. H. von Engelken to be Director of the Mint.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 18, 1916.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we pray for wisdom and grace both to know and to apply the golden rule of human conduct. Thou hast intrusted us with the application of the great principle of justice. Thou hast put so much of good into the human heart that we can apply with absolute certainty the final word of human right upon the basis of our own judgment of justice and of right. So Thou dost call us into the solemn responsibility of acting as free agents in a world. Thou hast committed much to the hands of Thy servants in this Senate in the establishment of right among men. Do Thou give to us love for men and interest in the welfare of all our fellow citizens and the consecration of our minds and hearts and life to the service of men. Do Thou, above all we can do, bless with the abundance of Thy grace and providence all the people. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as important business is to come before the Senate to-day, I think we ought to have a larger attendance, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Monday next, the 21st instant, I will submit some observations upon the pending so-called suffrage amendment as a partisan issue.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14338) to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ADAMSON, Mr. SIMS, and Mr. ESCH managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15947) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 6625) authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain donations of condemned cannon and cannon balls, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 19) relating to bills of lading, and for other purposes, together with accompanying papers and the message.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to an item in the majority report upon the revenue bill, page 2, which reads as follows:

In the opinion of your committee, concurred in by the Treasury Department, this latter sum, namely, $130,000,000, should be financed by a bond issue.

My purpose in calling attention to this statement is to say that I do not concur in it at all.

COLLECTION OF DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to Senate resolution 248 of the 15th instant, which will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The communication is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, August 17, 1916.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: By direction of the President I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the Senate resolution No. 248, of the 15th instant, in which I am requested to furnish the information called for by Senate resolution 133 of March 16, 1916, or report to the Senate promptly why such information can not be furnished.

In reply I have the honor to refer to my letter of June 17 last relative to Senate resolution 133 of March 16, 1916, a copy of which letter I inclose, in which all the information that I was able to obtain after an extensive search was stated and the reasons why the desired information could not be supplied fully set forth.

Search was made through the records in this department, and the collector of customs at the port of New York was called upon to furnish such information as might be disclosed by the records of that port. The Secretary of Commerce, having jurisdiction over the question of tonnage, and the auditor for this department were also consulted.

The collector at New York stated—and a copy of this letter was inclosed with my letter of June 17 last—positively that no collection of extra or discriminating duties were made since 1909, and that while it is a matter of tradition that certain discriminating duties were collected in the remote past these collections were merged with other collections of import duties and no separate account kept or rendered. The collector further stated that the records of tonnage duties collected prior to 1893 were destroyed. A list of the tonnage duties collected since 1893 was furnished by him and transmitted to you with my report of June 17.

The Secretary of Commerce stated that the statistical records of his department did not show collections of extra or discriminating duties for the reason that any such duties collected were combined with the additional duties collected on account of undervaluations of imported articles under the heading "Additional and discriminating duties."

Therefore the information can not be furnished for the reason that, as stated, there are no records from which the data can be ascertained.

Respectfully,

W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
DIVISION OF CUSTOMS,
June 17, 1916.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: I have the honor to refer to a resolution in the Senate of the United States, dated March 16, 1916, in which I am directed to furnish the Senate, first, with a tabulation showing, so far as possible, the amounts collected by the United States of extra or discriminating duties on imports in foreign vessels by years and by nationalities of vessels bringing such imports into the United States, from the passage of the act of August 10, 1790, entitled "An act making further provision for the payments of the debts of the United States," to date; second, with a tabulation showing, so far as possible, the amounts collected by the United States of tonnage duties on foreign vessels by years and by nationalities of vessels entering the ports of the United States from foreign countries, wherever and in such amounts as such tonnage duties were in excess of the tonnage duties imposed on vessels of the United States, from the first collection of such extra tonnage duties on foreign vessels in 1789 to date.

An extensive search has been made of the records of the department with the result that no record or report has been found in which the discriminating duties on imports or the discriminating tonnage duties on foreign vessels have been segregated.

The collector of customs at New York, to whom the matter was referred for such information as he might possess, reports that no information is obtainable regarding discriminating duties collected on imports in foreign vessels at that port, and submits a tabulation showing the amounts collected at that port since January 1, 1893, as tonnage duties on foreign vessels in excess of tonnage duties imposed on vessels of the United States.

The Secretary of Commerce, to whom the matter was also referred, states that his department has no record of discriminating duties for the reason that such duties have been combined with other items and not segregated, and submits a statement showing the tonnage duties collected upon foreign ships and American ships since June 30, 1883. His statement represents the entire amount of tonnage taxes collected plus small annual amounts collected as penal tonnage taxes.

I inclose herewith for your information copies of the correspondence had with the Department of Commerce and with the collector of customs at New York in the matter.

Respectfully,

W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented a petition of sundry citizens of Charlotteville, N. Y., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Santa Barbara, Cal., praying for the settlement of the difficulties between the railroads and their employees by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the proposed regulation of ocean transportation freight rates, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of the Minnesota State Game Protective League, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the creation of the McKinley National Park in Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented a petition of the Minnesota State Game Protective Association, praying that an agreement be entered into between the United States and Canada for the protection of migratory birds; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 6737. A bill for the relief of A. J. Lowary (Rept. No. 803);

S. 6716. A bill to provide for stock-watering privileges on certain unallotted lands on the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont. (Rept. No. 802); and

H. R. 14533. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent in fee simple to the district school board No. 112, of White Earth Village, Becker County, Minn., for a certain tract of land upon payment therefor to the United States in trust for the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota (Rept. No. 804).

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8492) to restore homestead rights in certain cases, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 805) thereon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 6850) authorizing the transfer of certain retired Army officers to the active list, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 806) thereon.

WASHINGTON-VIRGINIA RAILWAY CO.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 16700) to amend an act relating to the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, approved March 4, 1913, and I submit a report (No. 800) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. I do not think it will take more than a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8, paragraph 1, of an act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1913, relating to the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia (37 Stats. L., p. 975), as amended by an act approved February 25, 1916, be amended by adding to the names of the companies excluded from the operation of said section, after the words "and the Washington & Old Dominion Railway, excepting as to the regulation of its operation inside of the District of Columbia," in the third subdivision of said paragraph, on page 975, the following: "And the Washington-Virginia Railway Co., excepting as to the regulation of its operation inside of the District of Columbia."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask where the bill changes existing conditions.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It simply provides that the utilities commission shall not control the electric line except so far as it is in the District. It has nothing in the District except the terminals, and has 44 miles of track in Virginia. The Interstate Commerce Commission now controls it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOOL LAND IN MONTANA.

Mr. MYERS. From the Committee on Public Lands, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 6704) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent for certain land to school district numbered 9, of Sanders County, Mont., and I submit a report (No. 801) thereon. It is a local bill in regard to a school district in Montana. There is real need for it, it is a real emergency, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. MYERS. It is not on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to hear the bill read.

Mr. MYERS. I will be glad to have it read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed, upon proper application, to issue patent to school district No. 9, of Sanders County, Mont., for block 8, designated as "Public reserve," upon the approved plat of the town site of Dixon, Mont.

Mr. MYERS. I can explain the bill in a few words. When the Flathead Reservation was thrown open the act throwing it open provided for certain town sites and in each town site a lot for a public reserve. Dixon is a little town of about 100 population. This lot is standing there; there is no public use for it, and the school district is very much in need of a building site. This is for a public purpose, and there can be no better public purpose served, in my opinion.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN UNICOI COUNTY, TENN.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11474) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to permit the construction of a public highway through the fish-cultural station in Unicoi County, Tenn.

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest that we finish the morning business first, and then, perhaps, there will be no objection to the Senator's request.

Mr. SHIELDS. This will take but a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator proposes to take the bill from the calendar, and I object, as I have done in the past to similar requests.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask the Senator not to object, on account of the urgency of this matter. The public authorities there are constructing the highway and this is stopping the entire work. The bill has passed the House and it has the approval of the Department of Commerce.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us get through with the morning business, and I will speak with the Senator about it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Two bills have just been passed without objection.

Mr. SMOOT. They were not on the calendar. They were reported from committees.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is in order.

STORAGE OF EXPLOSIVES.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I desire to make a short statement. Some days ago I introduced a bill, being (S. 6849) to regulate the shipment and storage of explosives, and it was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Since that time I have received some photographs showing the widespread devastation on the island of Black Tom, where 4,000 panes of glass of a size of 22 by 26 inches were destroyed and various other damage done, as well as the loss of life. I desire that these photographs may be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce to give the members of the committee a graphic idea of the extent of this great disaster. I hope that they may report the bill favorably.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to bill (H. R. 15774) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, having met, after

"Whenever any member of the police department or the fire department of the District of Columbia shall become so permanently disabled through injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty as to incapacitate him for the performance of duty, or, having served not less than 25 years and having reached the age of 55 years shall, for any cause, become so permanently disabled as to incapacitate him for the performance of duty and shall make written application therefor and said application shall be approved by the Commissioners of said District, or, having reached the age of 60 years, in the discretion of the said commissioners, he shall in either event be retired from the service thereof and be entitled to receive relief from the said policemen and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia, in an amount not to exceed 50 per cent per year of the salary received by him at the date of retirement. In case of the death of any member of the police department or the fire department of the District of Columbia, before or after retirement from the service thereof, leaving a widow, or a child or children under 16 years of age, the widow shall be entitled to receive relief from the said policemen and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia, in an amount not exceeding $35 per month, and each child under the age of 16 years in an amount not exceeding $10 per month, and in no case shall the amount paid to any one family exceed the sum of $50 per month: Provided, That upon the remarriage of any widow granted relief under the provisions of this act such relief shall cease, and relief granted to or for any child or children under the age of 16 years shall cease upon their reaching that age: Provided further, That no widow, child, or children of any deceased member of the said police department or fire department resulting from any marriage contracted subsequent to the date of retirement of such member shall be entitled to any relief under the provisions of this act.

"The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to pay from the said policemen and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia, a sum not exceeding $75 in any one case to defray the funeral expenses of any deceased member of the police department or the fire department of said District dying while in the service thereof.

"There is created in and for the District of Columbia a board to be know as the police and firemen's retiring and relief board, to be composed of the corporation counsel of said District, to be designated by the Commissioners of the District, and one member from each the police department and fire department, to be designated by the said commissioners, and the said commissioners are authorized to change the personnel of said board from time to time, in their discretion, and they are further authorized and empowered to make, modify, and to amend from time to time regulations and rules of procedure for the conduct of the said board. The said board shall consider all cases for the retirement and relief of members of the police department and the fire department rendered necessary or expedient under the provisions of this act, and all applications for the relief of widows and children under 16 years of age. In every case of retirement of a member of either of said departments the board of police and fire surgeons shall certify, in writing, to the said retiring and relief board the physical condition of the member for whom retirement and relief is sought. The said retiring and relief board shall give written notice to any member of said departments under consideration by it for retirement and relief to appear before the board and give such evidence under oath as he may desire, and the proceedings of the board shall be reduced to writing and shall show the date of appointment of such member, his age, his record in the service, and any other information that may be pertinent to the matter of his retirement and relief. The said board is authorized and empowered to summon any person before it to give testimony, under oath or affirmation, as to any matter affecting retirement and relief under the provisions of this act; and any member of the board shall have power to administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses appearing before the said board. Such summons shall be served by any member of the Metropolitan police force, and upon the refusal or neglect of a witness to appear before the said board or to testify when required, he or she may be compelled to attend and testify as provided in the act of February 20, 1896, entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled "An act to punish false swearing before trial boards of the Metropolitan police force and fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved May 11, 1892,' and any witness knowingly making a false statement to the said board on any material matter shall be guilty of perjury and punishable accordingly. The said retiring and relief board shall in each case considered by it for retirement and relief submit to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia a report of its findings, and the said commissioners shall have power to approve, disapprove, or modify such findings or to remand any case for such further proceedings as they may deem necessary.

"The Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in their discretion and at any time, may cause any person receiving any relief allowance under the provisions of this act, who has served less than 25 years, to appear and undergo a medical examination, as the result of which the said commissioners shall determine whether the relief in such case shall be continued, increased, decreased, or discontinued. Should any person receiving relief under the provisions of this act, after due notice, fail to appear and undergo the examination prescribed here, the said commissioners are authorized in their discretion to reduce or entirely discontinue such relief.

"The Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, in their discretion, reduce or discontinue the relief granted to any person under the provisions of this act upon receipt of duly certified information from a court of competent jurisdiction that any person receiving such relief has been convicted in such court of any crime involving moral turpitude; and the said commissioners may also, in their discretion, reduce or discontinue the relief granted to any person under the provisions of this act when it shall appear to their satisfaction from evidence before them that such person is a habitual drunkard or guilty of lewd or lascivious conduct.

"Any retired member of the police department or fire department of the District of Columbia receiving relief under the provisions of this act may in time of flood, riot, conflagration, during extraordinary assemblages, or unusual emergencies, be called by the commissioners of said District into the service of the department from which he was retired with relief for such duty as his disability will permit of him performing, without compensation therefor; and the said commissioners shall have power to enforce compliance with the provisions hereof by withholding the payment of relief; but nothing contained in this section shall be construed to enforce residence in the District of Columbia upon any retired member of either of said departments when it shall appear to the satisfaction of said commissioners that residence elsewhere is rendered necessary by the physical condition of such member.

"All special policemen at street railway crossings and intersections in the District of Columbia, appointed pursuant to the provisions of an act, approved June 24, 1898, entitled 'An act to define the rights of purchasers of the Belt Railway, and for other purposes,' as amended by the act, approved February 28, 1901, entitled 'An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia,' and the act, approved February 10, 1912, amendatory thereof, are made members of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia, and, as members thereof, shall be entitled to all the rights, benefits, privileges, and immunities now possessed, or which may hereafter be possessed, by other members of said Metropolitan police force. Said special policemen shall likewise be subject to the same rules and regulations and to the same discipline as other members of said Metropolitan police force, it being the true intent and meaning hereof that the said special policemen and the regular members of said police force shall, acording to the period of service and classification, be placed upon the same footing.

"In determining the classes to which said special policemen shall be assigned in the Metropolitan police force they shall be given credit for the time they have served in their present positions, in the same manner and to the same extent as is now or may hereafter be given to the regular members of said police force.

"The superintendent of police of the District of Columbia may, in his discretion, substitute other members of the Metropolitan police force for said special policemen at street railway crossings and intersections, and during such periods of substitution said special policemen shall perform whatever service may be assigned to them by said superintendent of police: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to amend, alter, or repeal the existing law relative to the payment of the compensation of the said special policemen now appointed or those that may hereafter be appointed."

And the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 58, 108, 354, 355, 356, 359, and 361.

JOHN WALTER SMITH,
JOE T. ROBINSON.
J. H. GALLINGER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JAMES MCANDREWS,
C. R. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Maryland if he will briefly state the Senate amendments to which the conferees on the part of the House refuse to agree?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. There were some 90 or 100 amendments in disagreement, and it would therefore be impossible for me offhand to state them in detail. I suggest to the Senator from California that the reading of the report will furnish the information he desires.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Maryland will permit me, I think the Senator from California merely desires to know what amendments are now in disagreement, and those only number five or six.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I can state to the Senator from California the amendments still in disagreement between the conferees. They are as follows:

Amendments in disagreement.

Number.	Subject.	Page.
1	Half-and-half plan	1
58	Payment to Thomas W. and Alice N. Keller	30
108	Voluntary services, playgrounds	46
354-355	Price of gas in District of Columbia	126-127
356	Payment of fees, assessments, etc., to be credited wholly to District of Columbia revenues	127
359	Section number	129
361	Tax on intangible securities	131

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I move that the Senate further insist on its amendments, and ask a further conference with the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. ROBINSON, and Mr. GALLINGER conferees on the part of the Senate.

DONATIONS OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6625) authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain donations of condemned cannon and cannon balls.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments, so that the bill may be passed.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I hardly think the Senator from South Carolina knows what the amendments contain.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do know all about them. The House has merely increased the number of Grand Army posts and others to which it is intended to give these cannon.

Mr. WARREN. We have information from the War Department which shows that they have not any considerable number of condemned cannon toward this large number which is proposed to be donated. An amendment has been inserted in the House for the donation of certain brass cannon, which, I think, the Government does not possess, and also of several hundred bronze cannon and a large number of gun carriages. The bill, with the House amendments, ought to go to a committee to examine the whole matter and see what cannon and carriages the Government has that can be spared, and change the bill accordingly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, my only anxiety is to get the bill passed so that the Daughters of the American Revolution chapter in a town in my State, who are trying to erect a monument to Col. James Williams, who was killed at the battle of Kings Mountain over a hundred years ago, can get two bronze cannon.

Mr. WARREN. I am not opposing that; but the bill in its present form should go to a committee, as the Senator from South Carolina would himself agree if he should read the RECORD and learn the action taken in the other House.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know that a large number was added.

Mr. WARREN. Too large a number altogether, and donations were duplicated, for that matter.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator insists that the bill, with the House amendments, shall go to the committee, and the committee will report promptly and let the bill be passed, it is all I desire.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that in the regular way the bill go to the Military Committee or to a conference committee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I think the proper course is that the Senate disagree to the House amendments, request a conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon make that motion?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

AIDS TO NAVIGATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14338) to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. NELSON conferees on the part of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On August 15, 1916:

S. 5172. An act to exempt from taxation certain property of the Daughters of the American Revolution in Washington, D. C.

On August 18, 1916:

S. 4654. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 5914. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

PORTSMOUTH (N. H.) NAVY YARD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on yesterday during my enforced absence as a member of a conference committee the conference report on the naval appropriation bill was agreed to. I regret that I was not present, because I wanted to call attention to the fact that the only important appropriation in that bill for the Portsmouth Navy Yard was an item that had been appropriated for that yard six or seven years ago, but the then Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Meyer, of Massachusetts, held it up and refused to have the appropriation extended. It was in the nature of a reappropriation, but the conference committee saw proper to reject it, which I greatly regret.

I wanted to state that fact to the Senate, which I now do, without at all criticizing the conference committee, because I know the difficulties which confronted them in the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to have an opportunity of stating for the information of the Senator from New Hampshire that the Senate amendment relating to the Portsmouth Navy Yard was in a class with two other amendments, one relating to the Charleston Navy Yard and the other to the New Orleans station, and it was the unanimous thought of the conferees, of whom I was one, that these three items, aggregating over a million dollars, should be left out of the bill at this time. So the Senator from New Hampshire need not feel that the Portsmouth Navy Yard was in any way discriminated against by being treated from the same point of view.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the only suggestion I would make, in reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania, is that the item regarding the Portsmouth Navy Yard was an item that had been appropriated for years ago and which was, as I think, illegally and unlawfully held up. It was in the nature of a reappropriation. However, as I said before, I have no criticism to make on the conference committee at all. I think they acted as they found was wise under the circumstances.

Mr. PENROSE. Without going into the confidences of the conference room, it might be well to observe that the Senate conferees were informed that the amendments for Portsmouth, Charleston, and New Orleans could not by any possibility pass the House of Representatives at this session.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I in no wise question the wisdom of the conferees, but I wish to observe that they passed an item carrying an appropriation of about $2,000,000 for the improvement of a certain navy yard for the building of a large type of battleship, no one of which can either get in or get out of the harbor without going under the guns of a foreign nation and by their permission—with their good and kindly consent only.

GOVERNMENT OF PORTO RICO.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9533) to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes.

I will state, Mr. President, that no minority report has been filed as to this bill, and I think that there is very little, if any, disagreement as to its terms. There are a few amendments which have been reported, but I do not think it will take longer than an hour to dispose of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, why would it not be better to take up the shipping bill and dispose of that, and then take the Porto Rican bill up immediately afterwards?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Because we are now proceeding in the morning hour. The shipping bill will come up automatically at 2 o'clock, and I am afraid that if I can not get the Porto Rican bill up at this time I will not be able to get it up at all.

I will state, Mr. President, that this is a very important measure. The question of the citizenship of the people of Porto Rico has never been determined. When the islands were first occupied by the United States the sentiment was almost universal in favor of at least giving the option to the Porto Ricans to become citizens of the United States, and then there was an effort made on the part of some to prevent the accomplishment of that result.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I merely wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Democratic Party platform adopted at Denver eight years ago, I think, declared in favor of giving citizenship to the Porto Ricans.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; and, if I recollect aright, every Democratic platform from that time to this has declared that the rights of the people of Porto Rico should be defined. This bill gives citizenship to the people of that island, and yet it does not impose it upon them. They can retain their citizenship in Porto Rico if they so desire.

The bill also provides for a senate as a constituent part of the legislative branch of the Porto Rican government. I do not think there is any objection to the bill; at least there is none on the part of any members of the committee; and I think it will take not exceeding an hour to get through with it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Can the Senator give us any assurance that after we have conferred citizenship upon the people of Porto Rico the Democratic Party will not want to give away the island?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, Mr. President, the case of Porto Rico is entirely different from that of the Philippine Islands. The Porto Ricans came voluntarily under our governmental system, whereas the Philippine people did not do so; and there has been a grave question in the minds of many as to whether this Nation has a right to force a people to come under its jurisdiction and become its citizens against their will.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has there ever been a question as to the right of a nation to take over territory as the fruits of war?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, Mr. President, that may be; but we have another declaration——

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa will state his point of order.

Mr. CUMMINS. The motion is not debatable, as I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Before 2 o'clock the motion is not debatable.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado, for information, whether or not the people of Porto Rico have protested against having a senate foisted on them?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, sir; they have not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9533. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes seem to have it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was rejected.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 15455.

The motion was agreed to.

And the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15455) to establish a United States shipping board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, under date of London, August 3, Consul General Robert P. Skinner made a report, which will be found in the Commerce Reports of Wednesday, August 16. It is very brief, and I ask that it be read by the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

BRITISH SUBSIDY FOR TRADE-EXPANSION PURPOSES.

[Consul Gen. Robert P. Skinner, London, Aug. 3.]

A very interesting departure in British methods of securing trade in European countries was discussed in Parliament on July 31, a departure in which the Government itself appears as a full partner by the contribution of a subsidy of £50,000 ($243,325) per annum. On the occasion named the Chancellor of the Exchequer reported that a British company, under the title of the "British-Italian Corporation (Ltd.)," with a capital of £1,000,000 ($4,866,500), was registered on July 20. There will be no public issue, the capital having been subscribed privately, chiefly among banks.

The British Government agrees to contribute to the company by way of subsidy, during each of the first 10 years after its incorporation, an annual sum of £50,000 ($243,325), or the equivalent of 5 per cent upon its paid-up capital if less than £1,000,000. In consideration of the subsidy the company agrees to pay to the Government amounts equal to any dividend above a cumulative dividend of 5 per cent per annum which the directors may distribute to the shareholders in any year—after making such provisions as the directors may think desirable for bad and doubtful debts and the establishment of a reserve fund—until by such means the Government has been repaid (without interest) the amount so received by the company by way of subsidy.

A COLLABORATING ITALIAN COMPANY TO BE FORMED.

A company under the style of the Compagnia Italo-Britannica will forthwith be formed under Italian law with a capital of 10,000,000 lire, one half of which is to be taken by the British-Italian Corporation and the other half by the Credito Italiano and their friends. Out of the nine directors of the Italian company three will be British.

The chancellor concluded:

"The two companies will work together in close collaboration, and arrangements have been made by which their interests will be as far as possible identified, except that the subsidy of the British Government will naturally remain for the benefit of the British company exclusively.

"The primary object of the two companies is the development of the economic relations between the British Empire and Italy and the promotion of undertakings in the commercial and industrial field in Italy. They will carry out banking and financial operations which do not necessarily fall within the strict definition of banking as understood in this country."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the first amendment reported by the committee.

The first amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 2, line 3, after the word "property," to insert "on the high seas or the Great Lakes," so as to make the clause read:

The term "common carrier by water in interstate commerce" means a common carrier engaged in the transportation by water of passengers or property on the high seas or the Great Lakes between one State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States and any other State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States, or between places in the same Territory, District, or possession.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 4, it is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out the words "or the Great Lakes."

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I have offered the amendment just submitted because I have yet to hear from any source a single argument why the commerce of our Great Lakes system should be included in this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio will permit me, I think the Senator will want to strike out the remainder of that paragraph, as well as the words he has moved to strike out.

Mr. HARDING. Well, Mr. President, I have no objection to that course being taken, if the Senator from New Hampshire thinks that the phrase following the words "or the Great Lakes" modifies only the Great Lakes provision. If that is the case, I quite agree that the remainder of the paragraph should be stricken out, but I can understand how the remainder of the paragraph might refer to commerce on the high seas between the States and Territories, and therefore I have offered the amendment to strike out only the words "or the Great Lakes."

Mr. GALLINGER. Very likely the Senator is right. It occurred to me that the remainder of the paragraph ought to go out, but very likely not.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I started to say that I have yet to hear from any advocate of the bill a single reason why the commerce on the Great Lakes should be brought under the provisions of this bill. I wish some one might have said something about the impelling purpose of this extraordinary movement. On the Great Lakes we have a commerce developed which meets every requirement, and in connection with that commerce we have a shipbuilding industry that is one of our most notable American enterprises. We have so developed that industry that the shipbuilding on the Great Lakes system is the nearest American approach to a real competition in prices with the shipbuilding of the world.

I should like to ask, if they were only present, the Senators from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. LEWIS], and the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and the Senators from Indiana [Mr. KERN and Mr. TAGGART], and the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], those who represent the States bordering the Great Lakes——

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator might include Pennsylvania.

Mr. HARDING. I have assumed that the Senators from Pennsylvania are very much interested and all right on this very important question—I should like to ask why they will consent for one moment to the acceptance of a proposition which proposes to hamper or hinder or in any way interfere with this splendid system of water freight carrying on the Great Lakes?

Why, Mr. President, on the Great Lakes we have built up not only enormous shipping but American shipbuilding. We are building and operating freight steamships which are capable of carrying cargoes of 15,000 tons. Some of them are more than 600 feet in length, and are comparable with the finest freight-carrying ships built in any country in all the world; and I include in the comparison, many of the best ships in the freight-carrying business on the high seas. The important thing is that these ships are built more cheaply on the Great Lakes than similar ships are built anywhere else in the United States.

One of our greatest American weaknesses, particularly upon the coast, has been the inability of our shipbuilders to build freight steamships at rates anywhere near the rates that obtain in foreign countries. High-class passenger steamships may be built in our coast yards at prices not much greater than they cost in foreign countries; but the discrepancy between American and foreign prices on freight steamships is far greater. Not so on the Lakes. Only a little longer in the development of the shipbuilding industry on the Great Lakes and we will have developed a business that will enable us, in all probability, to compete with any in the world.

Especially important is the consideration of the fact that the enlarged Welland Canal and the enlarged locks through the rapids of the St. Lawrence River will soon give us an outlet from the Great Lakes to the ocean, so that our shipbuilding industries on the Lakes can enter into competition with the world and build ocean-going ships even so large as 1,000 feet in length. Under these circumstances, Mr. President and Senators, it seems to me to be the height of folly to endanger in any way this splendid American enterprise.

If there were a complaint about the inadequacy of our Great Lakes shipping; if there were a single protest against the existing Lake shipping rates; if there were a single reason in the world for bringing this enterprise under the operation of this board, one who believes in this bill could not well object. But there is not a single cause; on the other hand, in addition to hampering and discouraging this enterprise through the inclusion of that business under the operation of this bill, you are doing more than adding a hampering bit of legislation; you are opening the Great Lakes to foreign-built ships.

I want, as a citizen of Ohio, bordering the Great Lakes system, to utter my protest against such an action on the part of the Senate.

Mr. President, I do not mean to delay action by going into extended discussion, but there is another phase of this thing that it is worth while to call attention to. For 100 years we have had peace with our neighbor on the border. I hope that we will continue that peace for long centuries to come; but in this modern age, when human passions are not changed, apparently, no one knows when this country may become involved with its greatest competitor in commerce and shipping; and in that event it will be well to have maintained this great shipping industry on the coast of the Great Lakes.

Without a reason for including it, without the consideration which the committee has evidently given to the struggling river commerce of the country, and excluded it from the provisions of the bill—that is, the House committee did so—it seems to me that it would be the wise, patriotic, and highly American thing on the part of the Senate to leave this distinctively and exclusively American enterprise alone in its splendid accomplishment.

I hope the Senators will leave the Great Lakes out of the provisions of this bill. We are so well established, we are so well satisfied with the service, we are so proud of the accomplishment, that we do not want the paralyzing Federal arm to reach out and take it in under the provisions of this bill, which I believe is designed to destroy rather than to upbuild American shipping.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I wish to say that there is no sort of purpose or idea of harming the shipping on the Great Lakes by this bill. This amendment is a restriction, a limitation, upon the powers and jurisdiction and regulatory authority of this shipping board as compared with what was given them in the House bill. The bill as it came to the Senate gave this board jurisdiction, as far as they have it—it is the very mildest kind of regulatory power that they have—over the commerce that moves on the inland waterways as well as on the high seas and on the Great Lakes. By inserting this amendment we restrict and limit the jurisdiction and the authority of the shipping board to commerce on the high seas and on the Great Lakes, thereby entirely eliminating any jurisdiction they might otherwise have under the bill as it came from the House, over the commerce on the inland waterways. In other words, if the committee amendment is agreed to, there goes out of the bill any power or authority or jurisdiction of the shipping board over the inland waterways, the rivers, and the bays that are inland.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. But it is necessary to define precisely to what extent this authority may go, and we limited it by this amendment to the commerce on the high seas and the Great Lakes.

Mr. HARDING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will.

Mr. HARDING. I understand that very thoroughly, but I wanted to ask the Senator if there was a single call from any source for the inclusion of the Great Lakes commerce?

Mr. FLETCHER. I would not say that there was any specific call from the Great Lakes or any persons interested in the commerce on the Great Lakes. There was a demand, I think quite general and quite broad, a recommendation by the chambers of commerce and those who favored a shipping board, to give the shipping board the power that is given them in this bill over all water-borne commerce.

Mr. HARDING. Will the Senator explain why the river commerce was omitted and the Great Lakes commerce included?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Great Lakes were included, as the bill came over, along with the inland waterways and along with the high seas, too. They were included. We have not eliminated them. We have not struck out the commerce on the Great Lakes; and we had no protests, as I recall, during the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HARDING. Will the Senator explicitly answer this question: Why exclude the inland commerce characteristic of the rivers and still include the Great Lakes commerce?

Mr. FLETCHER. In the first place, the commerce on the rivers is comparatively small. It is struggling. It is more or less undeveloped as yet. We felt that there was no call, there was no real reason, for giving any board the jurisdiction to require the fixing of maximum rates, and that sort of thing, on these rivers. We thought that there was yet control, as far as there need be control, in the actual competition that was taking place there. In the next place, the Senator, of course, will agree that the Great Lakes afford a different situation. They are practically the high seas in many respects. The commerce there is both interstate and foreign. The commerce on the Great Lakes is very largely foreign commerce as well as interstate commerce, and it is of that character that ought to be subject to the same sort of regulation or control. The supervision to which the coastwise commerce is subject is all very mild, I think, in every respect, and this commerce ought to be put on the same footing as the coastwise commerce. It is an enormous commerce, and there can be no harm, as far as we can see, in including that along with the coastwise commerce.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will.

Mr. HARDING. In passing, I want to suggest that the Senator refer his statement about the very limited commerce on the rivers to his distinguished colleague at his right, the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I did not catch the remark of the Senator from Ohio referring to myself. I wish he would repeat it.

Mr. HARDING. In perfectly good humor, I suggested to the Senator from Florida that he refer his statement about the inconsequential character of river commerce to his colleague at his right, who I know will very gladly dispute the statement.

Mr. RANSDELL. I think the Senator from Florida is well able to handle this subject, but if he wishes to refer anything to me I will do my best to handle it.

Mr. HARDING. I have no doubt of it. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Florida to the fact that it is just as possible that a large percentage of the commerce of the Mississippi River is foreign commerce as it is possible for the Great Lakes commerce to be foreign commerce; and as a matter of fact, out of 100,000,000 tons a year of shipping on our Great Lakes, less than 5 per cent is assumed to be intended for foreign commerce.

But that does not answer the question. You have excluded the inland waterways from this regulatory provision, and manifestly you have excluded it because there came a protest from the river shipping interests that this sort of a measure would cripple their enterprise. I make the same charge with reference to the Great Lakes commerce, and contend that in all fairness the Senate ought to withhold its crippling efforts toward the commerce of the Great Lakes.

Now, I want to ask one more question, and then I will not interrupt the Senator further. Will not this bill, under the provision for enrollment of foreign-built ships, admit foreign-built ships to our Great Lakes commerce?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think so.

Mr. HARDING. Then, Mr. President, on that one admission alone, I am content to rest my objection to the passage of this bill. I am unalterably opposed to any provision in a measure for the upbuilding of an American merchant marine that will admit foreign-built vessels into our Great Lakes commerce.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, that is a possibility, but I think it is a very remote probability. The most of these ships will be built undoubtedly here in our own yards. If the board should acquire foreign-built ships, the bill would permit them to be registered and enrolled as American-owned ships, and admitted to our coastwise trade, if they saw fit.

Mr. HARDING. May I ask one more question? If the Senator from Florida thinks that such a thing is very remote, and that it is unlikely that foreign-built vessels will come into our Great Lakes commerce, why not remove the provision entirely, and give the assurance of this body and of Congress to our Great Lakes shipping interests that they are not to be interfered with in that way?

Mr. FLETCHER. The reason is that the restrictions and limitations already on this board and its authority to acquire these vessels particularly by purchase, charter, or lease are such that there is really no field of much consequence left to them in that direction; and I would not want to draw the line so strictly that you would create a board and pretend to give them authority to do things which really, in effect, they would have no power to do. I think we have narrowed it just as much as it is possible to do in order to make an efficacious piece of legislation.

I will not detain the Senate with discussing this question further. I think it is important to keep in the bill the amendment as it is submitted by the committee; and I think the commerce on the Great Lakes ought to be included with the commerce on the high seas under the head of common carriers by water in interstate commerce. What I meant by being foreign, of course, was mainly with reference to the commerce between our country and Canada. The Great Lakes actually border on a foreign country. The Mississippi River does not touch a foreign country. I think the amendment ought to stay as it is, and I believe no harmful results will follow such as the Senator expects. I will say, further, that when this matter was up there were no objections or protests submitted to our committee by people from the Great Lakes, so far as I can recall.

Mr. HARDING. May I ask one more question? Will the Senator from Florida say that there is no foreign commerce on the St. Johns and on the Indian River in Florida?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not mean to say that the commerce that passes down those rivers to the Gulf does not reach foreign countries. Of course, a certain amount of commerce passing over those rivers eventually moves to foreign countries; but what I had reference to on the Great Lakes was the commerce between this country and Canada, because Canada borders on the Lakes.

Mr. HARDING. Is it not a fact that cargoes are taken from the inland waters of Florida to foreign countries?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; I take it that that is true, unquestionably; but it does not prevent the river itself from being an inland waterway.

Mr. HARDING. And their shipping is not included in this bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; commerce on inland waterways is not regulated at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have been hoping for sometime past that the Government of the United States would, sometime in the near future, cease to shackle its own citizens, its own industries, with handicaps which our foreign competitors are not subjected to. It seems I have been mistaken.

I was not a Member of Congress when the Panama Canal act was passed, but most of the Senators here present were, and they remember very well that as a result of that act the railway companies were compelled to give up the ownership and operation of their steamers on the Great Lakes.

Mr. President, my observation has taught me that that action was a severe blow to American commerce on the Great Lakes, as contrasted with the conditions under which the Canadians operate. The Canadians have never been so foolish as to attempt to put strait-jackets upon their steamers on the Great Lakes. The one result, above all others, that has come from that order of the Interstate Commerce Commission has been to confer a direct benefit upon the Canadian Pacific Railroad, which operates a very considerable and a remarkably efficient fleet of passenger and freight ships upon the Great Lakes.

I myself have traveled upon those ships since that law and the subsequent order of the Interstate Commerce Commission went into effect. It is a matter of common knowledge that the officers of that railway company and the skippers and the mates upon the ships of the Canadian Pacific Railway Co. have been chuckling at the stupidity of the American Government in so handicapping its own people.

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator says that that has been the one result. Is it not true that there has been another result, that the cost of freight transportation and the transportation of other articles on the Great Lakes has materially increased, and in some cases has been doubled, over the price that prevailed when the ships were owned by the railroads?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not familiar with the figures, but I have heard that that is the case.

Mr. LIPPITT. I will inform the Senator that it is the case.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not mean to say the sole result of the law was the shackling of American steamers and American citizens in the way they conduct their business for the benefit of the Canadians. There were other results of course, but the thing that impresses me most is this great fact.

Mr. FLETCHER. Might I inquire of the Senator if he is referring now to the provision in the Panama Canal act, passed in 1912, section 11?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am in so far as it refers to the result on the Great Lakes.

Mr. FLETCHER. That act was passed in 1912, and the question is not involved in this bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think I may make my purpose clear in referring to it. There never was any harm done to anybody by the operation of these steamers as they were then operated, and it was entirely within the power and jurisdiction of the United States Government to regulate out of existence any evils which might have grown out of it. But the Government of the United States seems possessed under certain auspices with the idea that it shall regulate and handicap its own people, when just across the Lakes, almost within sight, we have an enterprising, vigorous people who know enough not to engage in those tactics.

Every time we have done it we have done it for their benefit; and I repeat with every assurance of the correctness of my statement that the Canadians rejoiced at that order, and they are rejoicing at this section of this bill which the Senator from Ohio seeks to have eliminated.

Under this bill this commission or board may put foreign-built steamers into the American Great Lakes coastwise traffic. Can you offer a better inducement to the Canadians? They would never subject their citizens to any such competition.

The Senator from Ohio has asked what demand there has been for including the Great Lakes shipping in this bill and the regulations provided in the bill. Thus far neither the Senator from Florida nor any other Senator who assumes to be sponsor or joint sponsor for this legislation has been able to say where that demand comes from. It seems to be an idea in this administration's mentality that it is the function of government to reach out and grasp for more power, wherever there is any opportunity to get that power, and generally that reaching out and that attempting to grasp is done without any comprehension whatsoever of the industrial problems involved.

If this bill passes in the form it is now drafted every package that is shipped in the Great Lakes traffic, every ticket that is sold to passengers in the Great Lakes traffic on American ships is to be regulated as to its form, the manner of its delivery, and all the different elements that go into the conduct of that commerce, whether it be passenger or freight. Section 19 gives the board complete power to go into the minutiæ of regulating package freight on the Great Lakes from the last dotting of an "i" to the crossing of a "t," when that traffic has been built up by enterprise and understanding between the shippers and companies. The regulation will prescribe to the last dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t" how every American shall do business, and the Canadians on the other side will be left perfectly free to make their own adjustments to suit the conditions which may arise from time to time, free from what has been so often called the strait-jacket which this bill attempts to put on the Great Lakes commerce.

I can not understand what demand there is for it. There has been no great public complaint; there has not been even slight public complaint; there has been no private complaint. It is simply an effort to extend the strong hand of the Government to indulge in this craze for Government ownership and operation in competition with our own citizens, who have been fulfilling all their functions in perfect freedom and with perfect satisfaction to all concerned for years and years upon the Great Lakes. The result will be to the benefit of the Canadians.

Once more. In addition to the order which prohibited the railway companies from operating any ship whatsoever on the Great Lakes, we are going to deliver another blow at the Americans who have engaged in that traffic for years to the satisfaction of all their customers and have built up, as the Senator from Ohio has said, the most significant and successful portion of the American merchant marine.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the feature referred to this morning in the bill embraces the omission of the inland waterways and the inclusion of the Great Lakes. The significance of the omission of one and the inclusion of the other ought not to be lost on the Senate before the vote is taken. There is no more reason for the regulation of the Great Lakes' traffic than there is for traffic on the Mississippi River. The transportation in every case inland is one that is wholly within our control. There is no foreign competition on either inland waterways or on the Great Lakes. The proposed regulation or the proposed Government competition that is to be administered on the one hand or delivered as a blow on the other proposed in this bill can have no other effect manifestly than to embarrass, annoy, and ultimately to destroy the Great Lakes' traffic in our own country.

I have not had a complaint from any private source on the transportation system of the Great Lakes. In the city of Chicago at its lake ports annually a considerable traffic is found. Certain classes of bulky freight, like ores, that come from the northern peninsula are delivered at Gary and Indiana Harbor, which is really a part of the manufacturing system of Chicago. The crescent of the shore that reaches around Chicago, the entire south shore of Lake Michigan, is an area within which there is an aggregate tonnage of a very large amount annually.

If there were any abuses, if there were overcharges, if any complaint based upon any reasonable ground existed, I certainly would have had some of that complaint. I have had neither a petition, a letter, nor a communication of any kind, nor have I had anyone in person, either at home or here in this Capital, make complaint to me of the condition of the Great Lakes traffic. It seems to me like this is a voluntary effort, as the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has said, to reach out by the sheer force of the Government and engage in something for which there is no demand and less need.

A natural effect of it is to discourage such transportation as now exists on the Great Lakes. The unwarranted regulation of the Great Lakes traffic is one reason. The competition that would naturally be engendered is another. I have not heard from any source—any private shipper, any commercial body representing the great manufacturing or distributing public—complaint of freight rates upon the Great Lakes. It is universally recognized that within proper season and time movement can be made of freight much more advantageously than by rail, even where rail communications for the entire haul are available.

So the provisions of the bill that apply to the Great Lakes traffic I can regard in no other sense than a regulation or a method that in the end will result in embarrassing, in hindering, and in the depreciation of the present water-carrier facilities given to the shipping public on the Great Lakes.

I do not wish to take up much time, Mr. President, on this subject; I have already occupied all the time that I feel like I ought; but I can not let this bill go to a roll call without making this protest in the name of the Great Lakes transportation companies and the individuals involved who are constantly running their craft as well as the shipping interests that ultimately, I think, will suffer as a result of this provision.

There is yet another interest not so large, but an interest concerned in this bill, that I feel I ought to not leave unnoticed. It applies to many ports where tidewater ports are found. In the Chicago River—the same river, by the way, where the Eastland turned over after being so efficiently inspected by the Department of Commerce, drowning over a thousand of my fellow citizens—in the Chicago River there is a constant tug service.

They go and come throughout the entire season. Their services are demanded at certain times more than others. The charge made is likely more in certain seasons than others. It depends on the weather, upon the condition of the shipping making that port; but altogether the tug service is something that is regulated in its charges by the conditions of the weather, the demands made upon that branch of transportation, and upon the number of tugs available at that point for any particular line of service. They ply in and out of the river, up and down the shore, waiting such opportune time as their services will be required by the incoming water craft coming that way. So the tugs are ones whose arrangement as to charges can safely be left to those who furnish and those who require that service. I have yet a single complaint to hear from any part of the Great Lakes service complaining of a solitary tug charge for towage or for any other service incidental to the ports of any of the Great Lakes.

There is a much larger matter than this connected with the tug service. In all the ports on tidewater, in the city of New York, the largest port in the western world, the tug service is very extensive. There is the year round a constant demand there, varying somewhat with the condition of shipping, the number that make port; and the charges are regulated somewhat by that and somewhat by the weather. The idea that a shipping board here in Washington must make a schedule for a tug to my mind is utterly ridiculous, whether the tug service is rendered on the Great Lakes or in a tidewater port.

The tug service in the very nature of things can not be regulated by a board in Washington. It is something the charge for which is made on the spot. It is a question not of collective bargaining but of individual bargaining.

The testimony here in these hearings show that a tug is owned by the captain, by the engineer, and by the man in the office who solicits the business and takes care of what managerial work there is of a clerical or soliciting kind. So three men in the port of New York will own a tug. They may have $20,000 or $25,000 in a tug, or even less. They run the business themselves. They are not incorporated. Some of them run a partnership. They have been earning their livelihood for years in that way. As the testimony of one of the captains who has been in the business for 25 or 30 years, in the hearings before the committee, indicated, they make their own charges or bargains when their services are required.

As he says, they go down at the entrance, down around the cape, and in the wintertime when it is stormy weather they lie there, it may be for a day or two days, without a chance for earning a dollar. Along comes a boat, an incoming craft, that needs a tug. If it is good weather they do not need any tug service; they need no power or help other than the ordinary transportation facilities of the ship itself, but in stormy weather they require the service of the tug. So their compensation ranges with the necessity of the incoming craft. A storm comes along and every steamship that makes the port requires their services. Then business is good. A long reach of good weather comes and they lie idle; business is bad. So at the end of the year they must average their charges in such a way that they can keep up their operating expenses, pay for what little help they need, and make a living by contributing, say, three of them together, their services and what money they put in when they buy the boat.

There is another very important service in a large part of the tidewater ports of our country—the lighterage service. The port of New York is peculiarly situated, as I remember the testimony of witnesses and from some observations made in business matters before I ever became a Member of this body. A large part of the freight coming from the West centers on the New Jersey shore at Jersey City, at Hoboken, and various other points along that side. There the railroads end for freight-carrying and freight-collecting purposes. Freight is taken across by a second system of water carriers to Brooklyn, where the great warehouses are; some of the greatest warehouses in the world are in Brooklyn. Incoming freight from all the western country collected on the Jersey shore is, therefore, carried across by water transportation to Brooklyn; it is there put in the warehouses, to await a favorable time for shipment abroad. A large part of the export freight of the country is collected in that way on the Jersey shore, transported across to the warehouses of Brooklyn, and there awaits a favorable time for export. Then, when the steamship is to be loaded, a third movement is necessary. The freight is taken out of the warehouses in Brooklyn and carried again to the freight steamers in the slips at some convenient point, wherever the company brings up its boats, when it is handled the third time and loaded into the steamship for export. The merchandise is then finally started on its voyage.

Every one of these complicated processes requires a carrier; every one of the carriers in New York City, both the tugs and lighterage service, will be affected by this bill, because here is the shipping board, and every time one of these men running a tug or having a lighterage service to render the owners of merchandise, requiring a charge to be made based upon rapidly changing conditions that present themselves every 24 hours in the port of New York he must come to Washington or reach some officer in New York City for the purpose of making a rate. By the time the rate is made, the opportunity to transact the business will be gone.

You can delay the freight trains that come in on the Jersey shore just as you can delay the freight trains which come into Chicago, and the freight will accumulate there just as it does in Chicago. Especially is that true as to perishable commodities, and also as to articles that require to be handled rapidly, even if not perishable, in order to realize the advantage of the market. What is the natural result of it? Why, the perishable commodities must be handled at once; they must be taken across and put in cold storage, if they are food products, where such accommodations can be found, and then handled a third time before they reach the steamer, whether it be in New York City or in Chicago. The charges vary with shifting conditions.

It seems to me that the principle which is embodied in one of these sections which regulate this matter was written by somebody who does not know the way business is actually transacted in this country in the transportation by land or water either inland or on shore. When this is actually worked out in practice it seems to me there is nothing but evil in such attempts, especially the provision that is sought to be eliminated by the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. These provisions will rise up to plague their inventors and their authors, because in the actual application of these measures, they can not work out, except in harm to the great interests involved and to the manifest annoyance of those who are trying legitimately to conduct their business.

For these reasons, Mr. President, it seems to me that especially the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio ought to be adopted.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, one error that has crept into this discussion ought to be corrected. It is not true that river transportation is wholly excluded from this bill. Foreign commerce upon the rivers of the country is included in the bill and will be subject to the same vexatious and restrictive regulations that are provided for other kinds of commerce. I am sorry that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] has made his motion rather a local one, for I believe that every consideration which makes against the proposed regulations of commerce upon the Great Lakes is applicable with equal force, and sometimes increased force, to interstate commerce upon the high seas. I wish the Senator would include in his amendment the words "on the high seas," as well as "or the Great Lakes."

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will allow me to interrupt him long enough, I desire to say that the only reason the amendment has not yet been presented is that it is not in order under the parliamentary rules, but I have such an amendment which I intend to submit later.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Ohio could move to strike out the words "on the high seas or the Great Lakes."

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no necessity for that motion. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee inserting those words.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the substance of it.

Mr. FLETCHER. That raises the whole question.

Mr. HARDING. I thought I would reach the result more effectively by proposing an amendment, upon page 7, section 9, to strike out the phraseology as to the enrollment and the licensing of vessels; that is, on page 7, line 17, to strike out the words "or both registered and enrolled and licensed."

Mr. CUMMINS. That, of course, would reach the question of the use of foreign-built ships upon the Great Lakes, but would not touch the regulations which are proposed in the bill from section 15 to its end.

Mr. President, I think no one can accuse me of looking with a prejudiced eye upon governmental regulation of common carriers, but when the Government does attempt to regulate common carriers it ought to do it with intelligence and with some regard to the conditions under which the transportation is carried on. This is not the first time the question with respect to the regulation of our water-borne commerce has arisen. I look upon the subject as a whole, for I do not think there is any difference between the regulation of our domestic commerce upon the Great Lakes and its regulation upon the high seas.

The subject came up in a very interesting and concrete way in 1910, when Congress revised what is known as the interstate-commerce law—a rather complete revision—which took into consideration all phases of the regulation of common carriers.

It was proposed then to bring within the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission domestic commerce by water, whether upon rivers, upon lakes, or upon the high seas. The proposal was rejected, and was rejected because every student of the subject knows that the system of regulation that ought to be imposed upon water commerce is radically and essentially different from the regulation sought to be imposed upon carriers by land; or, in other words, upon the railways. It was not thought practical at that time by those who were studying the subject, and, without meaning at all to disparage the Commerce Committee, I think they had about as much knowledge of it and of the necessities of the people and of the commerce as any member of the Commerce Committee at this time; but it was concluded then that it was wholly impracticable and impossible to put upon the water commerce of the United States the regulations which had been wrought out for land commerce, and therefore there was no attempt to extend the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission to water-borne commerce, save in one respect, to which I will call attention in a moment.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BECKHAM in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator from Iowa has been conspicuously identified with the evolution of the regulation of transportation, and would know, I imagine, if anybody would know, if there is a call for this kind of regulation of water commerce. I should like to have him state to the Senate whether he has known of any demand for the regulation of this commerce, particularly on our Great Lakes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have known of no unjust practices on the Great Lakes. I have heard, as, of course, everybody has heard, that there have been times when the coastwise traffic of the country carried on upon the high seas may have needed regulation in some respects, and I am not opposed to the regulation of water-borne traffic, whether on rivers, on lakes, or on the sea, but I am unalterably opposed to imposing upon that traffic a system of rules which will strangle and destroy it, simply because we have adopted that system of rules and applied it to the railways of the country. The regulation proposed in this bill is substantially the regulations that we have adopted for the railways. There is no essential difference, and we are trying to do at this moment what every student of this subject has rejected for years, putting upon ships the same general nature of regulations that we have put upon railway trains and railway management. It is absurd. I do not understand how Senators can summon the courage to surround our water-borne commerce with regulations of the character that are found in this bill. They are not the result of study; they are not the result of examination; they have simply been lifted bodily—I do not mean literally, but bodily—from the interstate-commerce law and made applicable in the hands of the shipping board to the commerce carried upon the water.

I said that some of us had examined this subject pretty carefully in 1910, and the result of our investigation was that the utmost limit of the reasonable legislation that could then be proposed was to take in the water carriage when it constituted a part of a through haul of which a railway was another part. So we enacted this provision:

The commission may also, after hearing, on a complaint or upon its own initiative without complaint, establish through routes and joint classifications, and may establish joint rates as the maximum to be charged, and may prescribe the division of such rates as hereinbefore provided, and the terms and conditions under which such through routes should be operated, whenever the carriers themselves shall have refused or neglected to establish voluntarily such through routes or joint classifications or joint rates; and this provision shall apply when one of the connecting carriers is a water line. The commission shall not, however, establish any through route, classification, or rate between street electric passenger railways not engaged in the general business of transporting freight in addition to their passenger and express business and railroads of a different character, nor shall the commission have the right to establish any route, classification, rate, fare, or charge when the transportation is wholly by water, and any transportation by water affected by this act shall be subject to the laws and regulations applicable to transportation by water.

That simply indicates how impossible we found it at that time, although there was a complete review of the whole subject, to formulate a system of regulation of water commerce.

I would be opposed to the regulation of such commerce in this bill, even if there were no other reason than the one I have given; but there is another reason, and it is fundamental, and no matter how the bill might be amended, it would compel me to vote against it. The Government is attempting to do two contradictory things in this proposed law. It is, first, endeavoring to regulate water commerce by undertaking the commerce itself, by acquiring ships with the right to operate them under certain conditions, or to charter them to others, attaching such restrictions and limitations as it may see fit to attach for their operation. That is one way we are attempting to regulate water commerce in this measure. Not content with that, we immediately proceed to regulate all ships through a system of declarations concerning what they may do or what they may not do, and conferring power upon the shipping board to enforce such regulations.

Mr. President, there never was anything of the sort known in the history of mankind. I challenge the annals of the world to produce an instance in which a Government has attempted to regulate commerce, first, by describing how the commerce shall be carried on and subjecting those who are engaged in it to heavy penalties, and, next, by purchasing vessels and entering into competition with the very instrumentalities which it attempts to regulate. The two things, Mr. President, the two theories, are absolutely inconsistent with each other and irreconcilable, and they can not successfully live together. The one is Government ownership and operation and the other is Government regulation and restriction.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I shall favor the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, although I would be very much better satisfied if our domestic commerce—that is, the coastwise commerce, including the commerce on the Great Lakes, the rivers, and the high seas—should be excluded entirely from the operation of this bill.

Of course it would leave no enforceable part of the bill if they were excluded from the regulatory provisions of the bill; but nevertheless we ought to exclude them until some one or somebody, some appointed commission or appointed committee, explores the subject of water-commerce regulation and composes a system which is applicable to it, for it is perfectly well known that the system we have established for railways will destroy water commerce if applied to it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the idea is that this is a bill to develop the American merchant marine. The people of the country think this is a bill for the upbuilding of the American merchant marine, yet, Mr. President, that is far from the real object of the bill. The main features of the bill deal with the regulation of shipping, the regulation and fixing of rates, and all that sort of thing. There is not anything in the bill that looks to the upbuilding of the American merchant marine, except as it may be done by Government construction or Government purchase or Government lease.

The amendment of the committee is good as far as it goes. Before that amendment was put in, the bill provided for the regulation of rates, the regulation of domestic commerce, on the Great Lakes and on the high seas and on the rivers. By the insertion of this amendment the regulation of domestic commerce, so far as the rivers of the country are concerned, was eliminated, and that is the reason why I say it is good as far as it goes. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio makes it better, because it goes a little further and relieves a little bit more of the domestic commerce from the regulations and restrictions imposed by the bill. If we were to go further and cut out the high seas, we would be doing still better.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill as it came to the Senate did not include inland transportation on the rivers, did it?

Mr. JONES. Why, it includes all domestic commerce from a port of one State to a port of another State, whether by river, by Great Lakes, or by the high seas.

Mr. GALLINGER. How has the river transportation been eliminated?

Mr. JONES. By limiting it to the Great Lakes and the ocean.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, yes. The Senator thinks that the text of the bill as it came from the House did include rivers, although they are not specifically mentioned?

Mr. JONES. Yes; there is no question about that at all. The bill as it came from the House read in this way:

The term "common carrier by water in interstate commerce" means a common carrier engaged in the transportation by water—

Now, that is whether by river, lake, or ocean—of passengers or property between one State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States and any other State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States, or between places in the same Territory, District, or possession.

So that the amendment of the committee simply restricts the application of the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is undoubtedly right.

Mr. JONES. And, as I say, it is good to that extent.

Mr. President, this provision, if it is going to be left in and the amendment of the committee adopted, would be much better if it were further amended by providing that it shall apply only to the transportation of passengers or property by water on regular routes from port to port. Under the bill as it is and as amended by the committee this is a regulation of all sorts of these carriers by water, whether the vessel is one that is going regularly from one port to another or whether it is a vessel that goes this day to this port and then to another port to pick up a part of the cargo and to-morrow to some other port to pick up a part of the cargo and then to another port, and so on, finally going to its final destination, a port in another State.

Mr. President, I have had no experience in water transportation. I do not know very much about it from a practical standpoint; but, from what little knowledge I have and what observations I have made, it seems to me that the real tendency of this legislation, as it is proposed here, is to drive out of business what we might term the independent or the tramp carrier by water in domestic commerce, and confine the business to the regularly established steamship lines operating upon regular schedules.

I put in the RECORD the other day a letter from a practical business man, who not only has had great experience in the manufacturing business but who also has had a great deal of practical experience in water transportation; and I want to read an extract from that letter as bearing upon this particular proposition. After quoting the section of the bill providing for this regulation, he says:

Apply this to the carrying of lumber from Oregon and Washington to California, in which service there are usually about 100 steam schooners operating under normal conditions. There are scarcely any two of them that will receive the same rate, and it is not often that they receive the same rate for two trips in succession, but change from trip to trip. Again, there is some lumber that is shipped in large bulk from one mill, loading the boat in one day and unloading at the other end in one place in from one to two days. The same material is frequently shipped from a number of other mills in small quantities, so that a boat has to take three or four days more to get her cargo, sometimes taking as long as four or five days, and frequently has to deliver it at two or more places.

And, Mr. President, in the case of these vessels that do not operate on regular routes, a vessel, when it starts out, does not know whether it is going to get freight at this port or at that port, or where it is going to have to make delivery; and therefore it can not tell beforehand what its charge ought to be.

Now, say such a boat is worth from $200 to $400 a day, according to the rate prevailing. It is very evident that the one cargo can be carried for much less than the other; and yet under this bill, as I understand it, it would have to be carried at the same rate. We have a large volume of lumber business moving in a much more exaggerated way than shown above. I have known a steamer coming in here putting on as many as 16 different parcels from a large number of mills, to be delivered to as many as 10 different places. How could any general tariff or freight rate apply to such a business as against a mill that gives a boat a full load to a single point of delivery? In the one case each parcel has to be marked and kept separate; the boat is responsible if any of it is missing, mislaid, or delivered to the wrong party; so that you can readily see that one is worth a great deal more than the other. Yet it is the same kind of lumber, from the same point of origin, and to the same point of destination.

Oh, but, Mr. President, it is said: "This board will be a reasonable board. It will act in a reasonable sort of way. It will take all the varying conditions into account." Of course the board will attempt to act reasonably; but a board of this kind will have to make general rules. It can not make a rule that will apply to one boat at this port to-day and not apply to another boat at the same port or at a different port on the same day, or to a boat going to-morrow from the same port or from a different port to the same port of destination or some other port of destination. This board can not take up each particular case as it comes up, each particular instance and each particular ship.

That simply emphasizes what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has pointed out very clearly—the difference between this character of business and the railroad business, and the difficulty of regulating this kind of business as compared with regulating transportation by railroad. It is absolutely unworkable unless they make general rules, and the very moment they make general rules they interfere with the proper carrying out of the business as described by this gentleman here; and they will drive out, as I said, the independent or what may be termed the tramp ship from the domestic trade, and concentrate the business in the regular lines. In other words, it tends to monopoly.

This gentleman says further:

Another thing, the lumber market has always been subject to constant change either up or down, and so has the freight rate, largely in sympathy with the lumber market, but more often because of either plenty of tonnage or scarcity of it, which has been fully demonstrated during the last few years. Take, for instance, a year or two before the war, the first year of the war, and, in fact, up into last year freight was very low because tonnage was very plentiful.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what his suggestion is as to an amendment there?

Mr. JONES. I have not suggested any amendment, except that I am supporting the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. I would much prefer to strike out the whole thing; but if that is not done, then I am going to propose an amendment after the words "Great Lakes" reading as follows: "on regular routes from port to port."

Mr. FLETCHER. I think I will not object to that amendment. I do not want to interfere with lines such as the Senator suggests, if he thinks his amendment will cure that. I believe this: The ocean tramp is not a common carrier and therefore is not affected by this bill; but to make it plain as to the ships that the Senator has in mind I am perfectly willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. JONES. I am very glad to hear the Senator say that, because I think myself that that will improve it very much, and I think I shall not read further from this letter, in view of the statement made by the Senator.

I just want to say this: Take it along the Columbia River, for instance, between Oregon and Washington. While I think that that is eliminated now by the language of the bill, it illustrates what would take place in some of the lake traffic where different States are involved in a very short route. Take it along that river: Here is a boat owned by some party at one point on the Washington side, and it plies up and down the river, going first over to an Oregon port and then coming back to a Washington port, and going over to an Oregon port and coming back to a Washington port between two terminal points, you might say. It is all interstate business, and yet the conditions at one port are entirely different from the conditions at another port. The vessel may stop at one port one day and go on past that port the next day to another, and so on. And so with reference to some points on the Lakes where the home port of the vessel may be near the boundary line between the States.

So, Mr. President, in view of the statement of the Senator, I shall not take further time on this matter. If the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is not adopted, then I shall offer the amendment that I have mentioned.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the other day, when I first spoke on the bill, I called attention in a brief manner to the discrimination in this bill between transportation on rivers and on the Great Lakes. Now, I read from page 2. I quote the following language:

The term "common carrier by water in interstate commerce" means a common carrier engaged in the transportation by water of passengers or property on the high seas or the Great Lakes between one State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States and any other State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States, or between places in the same Territory, District, or possession.

That is the definition of a common carrier by water in interstate commerce. Now, turning to section 19, you find—

That every common carrier by water in interstate commerce shall establish, observe, and enforce just and reasonable rates, fares, charges, classifications, and tariffs—

And so forth. Then it requires, in the same section, as follows:

Every such carrier shall file with the board and keep open to public inspection, in the form and manner and within the time prescribed by the board, the maximum rates, fares, and charges for or in connection with transportation between points on its own route—

And so forth. Then, in line 17, it is provided:

No such carrier shall demand, charge, or collect a greater compensation for such transportation than the rates, fares, and charges filed in compliance with this section.

Then I read further:

Whenever the board finds that any rate, fare, charge, classification, tariff, regulation, or practice demanded, charged, collected, or observed by such carrier is unjust or unreasonable, it may determine, prescribe, and order enforced a just and reasonable maximum rate, fare, or charge, or a just and reasonable classification, tariff, regulation, or practice.

Now, under the language of the bill, with those provisions in section 19, which practically amount to the same regulation in respect to rates, and so forth, that the Interstate Commerce Commission has over railroad transportation, there can be no doubt at all but that it applies under this amendment to ships on the Great Lakes. Now, let me call attention to the discrimination, and I will put a concrete case.

New Orleans, one of the great commercial emporiums of the South, is situated on the Mississippi River somewhere about 100 miles above the mouth. It may be a little less or it may be a little more. I do not recall the exact mileage, but it is pretty near 100 miles. Now, that port would be immune from the regulations of section 19 of this bill, while the term "on the high seas" would include such ports as that of Jacksonville, in the Senator's own State. His port would be subject to the provisions of section 19. It would be regulated.

Vessels plying from Atlantic ports to Jacksonville would be subject to all the provisions and conditions of section 19, while vessels plying along the Atlantic coast or the Gulf coast up the river to New Orleans would be utterly immune under the provisions of the bill.

Now, there is the injustice of it and the discrimination. It is practically violating the spirit of the Constitution, which says that no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another State. The port of New Orleans in that case would have an advantage and preference over the ports in the Gulf, over Pensacola, over Jacksonville, Miami, and all those other ports, because the term "on the high seas" includes all the ports close to the ocean, and it would include those ports, while the port of New Orleans would be utterly immune; it would be in a class by itself; and it would have an advantage in that respect over the ports on the Great Lakes.

One reason why this regulation of section 19 is dangerous and harmful arises from the fact which I briefly discussed at the outset in the consideration of this bill, and that is, it is a handicap and an embarrassment to what in common parlance are called tramp ships. All who are conversant with our lake and coastwise traffic know that there are schooners, sailing vessels, steam schooners, and a lot of vessels that can not be designated as plying on regular routes. They have not any fixed route or fixed time schedule. They go from port to port, wherever they can get any traffic to carry, and they are glad to get it at any rate they can in order not to be idle or to have to leave a port in ballast. Such tramps, and I call them that for short, in respect to rates are at the mercy of the ports at which they land and where they hope to get cargo. They must take the rate that port affords for the time being.

Now, those tramp vessels go from port to port, sometimes to one place, sometimes to another, along the coast, and how impracticable it is for them to file schedules with the shipping board. "Every such carrier," is the language on page 20 of the bill, in section 19, "shall file with the board and keep open to public inspection, in the form and manner and within the time prescribed by the board, the maximum rates, fares, and charges," and so forth.

Take a tramp vessel on the Pacific coast operating in the State which the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] so ably represents. Schooners ply there from the mills on Puget Sound carrying lumber to various ports along the coast. How is it possible for them to file schedules in every case? They come to a sawmill and get a cargo of lumber to carry. They do not know until they get to the mill to what port the lumber is going.

It may be a port close by and it may be a hundred miles off. As the Senator from Washington said, in order to get a full cargo they have to take on board the ship before they proceed to sea cargoes, it may be, from a half dozen different ports along the coast, first stopping at one port and discharging, and it may be getting a little additional cargo there, or it may be not, and then going to another port, and so on, until ultimately, after they have touched at a half dozen or more ports, they may finally dispose of the cargo of lumber.

Does it not seem utterly preposterous, does it not seem perfectly impracticable to compel vessels engaged in that kind of traffic to file schedules and to adhere to those schedules? How utterly impracticable it is to have them prescribe rates in order to meet all the requirements. Those coast schooners would have to prescribe a rate for every time a boat would go to the great ports on the Pacific coast, and the same would apply to the Atlantic.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator think the amendment suggested by the Senator from Washington would meet those cases?

Mr. NELSON. I think an amendment of that kind would meet it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am willing to accept it.

Mr. NELSON. I think an amendment of that kind ought to be inserted in that paragraph of the bill on page 1, because the phrase "running on regular routes" is open to a double construction. I think tramp steamers should be excluded both in respect to ocean traffic, as defined as common carriers in foreign commerce, and in respect to the coastwise trade. Ocean tramps, as commonly understood, should be excluded in both cases in order to make it clear.

I know the Senator from Florida, who is familiar with shipping conditions, knows more about it by experience than I do. He lives in one of the large coast cities of the South and is familiar with that traffic. He knows what a great service the ocean tramp is, whether in foreign commerce or in our domestic commerce. He knows what a great service they render to our carrying trade. I know their use on the Lakes, where they are a great advantage, because they make a lot of ports and aid people to reach ports of commerce that regular routes do not reach. But more than that, indirectly they are the regulator of rates on the regular routes. They will compel them, especially in heavy or bulky goods, such as the tramps carry, to keep down to the level of the tramp rate.

I suggest to the Senator that if an exception was made in both classes of cases of tramp carriers it would not be so bad. I can see how, in the case of vessels running on regular routes and regular schedules year in and year out, it is possible to regulate them, and how it is possible to have them file schedules of rates, and so forth, but I can not see how it is possible in the case of these tramps. Especially is it difficult in the coastwise trade.

I see the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is now here. I again call attention to the case of New Orleans and to the great advantage this gives that port. He was out of the Chamber when I spoke of it. It leaves New Orleans outside of the regulative power of section 19 of the bill. New Orleans is, as I said, about 100 miles, or near that—I forget whether it is a little less or a little more, the Senator will know—above the mouth of the river.

Mr. RANSDELL. It is about 108 miles, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I thought I was very near it. I called the attention of the Senate while the Senator was out to the fact that a vessel in the coastwise trade plying along the Atlantic or the Gulf coast would be utterly immune if they sailed up to New Orleans; they would not come under the regulative provisions of the bill, while a coastwise vessel entering Gulf ports, entering Pensacola, Mobile, Jacksonville, or Miami, or any of those ports, would be subject to the regulative provisions of section 19 from which I have just quoted. Mr. President, I ask that the entire section 19 be incorporated in my remarks at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The section referred to is as follows:

SEC. 19. That every common carrier by water in interstate commerce shall establish, observe, and enforce just and reasonable rates, fares, charges, classifications, and tariffs, and just and reasonable regulations and practices relating thereto and to the issuance, form, and substance of tickets, receipts, and bills of lading, the manner and method of presenting, marking, packing, and delivering property for transportation, the carrying of personal, sample, and excess baggage, the facilities for transportation, and all other matters relating to or connected with the receiving, handling, transporting, storing, or delivering of property.

Every such carrier shall file with the board and keep open to public inspection, in the form and manner and within the time prescribed by the board, the maximum rates, fares, and charges for or in connection with transportation between points on its own route; and if a through route has been established, the maximum rates, fares, and charges for or in connection with transportation between points on its own route and points on the route of any other carrier by water.

No such carrier shall demand, charge, or collect a greater compensation for such transportation than the rates, fares, and charges filed in compliance with this section, except with the approval of the board and after 10 days' public notice in the form and manner prescribed by the board, stating the increase proposed to be made; but the board for good cause shown may waive such notice.

Whenever the board finds that any rate, fare, charge, classification, tariff, regulation, or practice, demanded, charged, collected, or observed by such carrier is unjust or unreasonable, it may determine, prescribe, and order enforced a just and reasonable maximum rate, fare, or charge, or a just and reasonable classification, tariff, regulation, or practice.

Mr. NELSON. Now, coming to the Great Lakes, I insist that the ports of the Great Lakes should have as fair a treatment as the port of New Orleans. The port of Chicago, the port of Toledo, the port of Cleveland ought to have the same privileges and enjoy the same benefits that the port of New Orleans enjoys.

We have on the Lakes two or three kinds of vessels. We have first passenger vessels that carry in addition to passengers what I call package freight. They run very fast; they run on regular routes; but the bulk of the tonnage on the Great Lakes is practically carried not by such route ships but by independent concerns, a species of tramps. They have, for instance, vessels built on the Great Lakes made expressly for the purpose of carrying iron ore from the head of the Lakes down to Chicago and ports on the Great Lakes, and then carrying coal or other bulky products back again to the Lakes. There are several kinds of vessels made for that traffic. To put those vessels under the strict regulation of this bill would be unfair and unjust.

Then, in addition to that, we have a lot of smaller concerns, independent concerns, that may own a vessel or two. There are steel sailing schooners on the Lakes and there are a great many steam schooners. We have a lot of those independent vessel owners who pick up business wherever they can get it along the shore of the Great Lakes. There are many places I have seen on the Great Lakes where large steam schooners and steel schooners touch on a port on the lake and load up with cordwood. They go to another port and they supplement their load with railroad ties. They go to another port and they put on some telegraph or telephone poles. In that way they pick up a load and do a lot of business that would not be done by vessels on regular routes.

It seems to me it would work a great hardship to compel those little independent schooners and small vessels doing that kind of a small traffic from port to port to file schedules and submit to all the regulative restrictions of this bill.

As has well been said by other Senators here, and I can say the same, there has been no demand for any of this kind of legislation that I know of from the people on the Great Lakes. None has come to me. One of the great ports on the Great Lakes, Duluth, is in the State that I have the honor, in part, to represent, and no demand has come from either the ship owners or those who employ shipping for any of this kind of legislation.

I have received one solitary single letter from a man at Minneapolis who has no interest in these matters, particularly in shipping, who thought it would be——

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I will yield in a minute. He thought it would be a good plan to regulate them, but he gave no reasons for his demand. Aside from him, I have not heard a word in favor of this legislation.

On the other hand, if the Senator will yield to me a little further, before we knew that this matter of the Great Lakes was to be put into the bill, before anybody supposed that they would be included within the scope of the bill, when it was thought that it only would include river navigation, the people of Minnesota, from St. Paul and Minneapolis down, protested against including river navigation within the regulative scope of the bill. Intrinsically and by itself I think it is just, but what I complain of is the discrimination between that and traffic on the Great Lakes. Why let the port of New Orleans——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NELSON. I will yield to the Senator. The Senator must excuse me; I had forgotten; I ought to have yielded to him sooner.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am very patient. I infer from the Senator's remarks that he thinks the port of New Orleans should be excluded from the terms of the bill because it is 110 miles from the Gulf. Am I correct in that?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. Does the Senator contend that the city of Philadelphia should also be excluded from the terms of the bill because it is a considerable distance from the ocean, up the Delaware River?

Mr. NELSON. No; because there the tide ebbs and flows. The tide ebbs and flows up to Philadelphia and away beyond. It is an estuary of the ocean, while that is not the case with the port of New Orleans.

Mr. RANSDELL. It goes a long way up the river.

Mr. NELSON. The port of Jacksonville, too, I understand, is up the St. Johns River quite a distance, and I consider that within the purview of the bill under the phrase "on the high seas."

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask the Senator how he regards the port of Houston, Tex., on Buffalo Bayou, quite a distance from the Gulf?

Mr. NELSON. I think that comes within the definition as being on the high seas.

Mr. RANSDELL. It is on the high seas?

Mr. NELSON. As defined by our admiralty courts, I have not any doubt of it.

Mr. RANSDELL. What distinction does the Senator make between Houston and Philadelphia and New Orleans?

Mr. NELSON. Did the Senator refer to Houston? I thought he said——

Mr. RANSDELL. I said Houston, which is on Buffalo Bayou.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, I do not hold that in the same position as New Orleans, which is away up; it is not an estuary of the sea. The term "high seas," as defined by our courts—our admiralty courts—includes practically the ocean up to low water and it includes the estuaries and gulfs and bays of the ocean that have direct connection, but it does not include sounds. They are distinguished, as it were, from the ocean.

Mr. RANSDELL. I, of course, am not qualified to pass on a question of that kind, but I know in the minds of the committee in framing the bill all cities like Philadelphia and New Orleans and Jacksonville and Houston, which are served by ocean-going vessels, big-draft vessels, served not by river-commerce vessels at all but by vessels of the biggest draft, are regarded as subject to the terms of the bill. If they are not included in it, there certainly ought to be an amendment to include them, for there was no intention to leave them out. It is ocean-going commerce that we are trying to regulate, and all those cities have a tremendous ocean-going commerce. The Senator must not get the impression that New Orleans is enjoying any special privileges under the bill. If so, the Senator from Louisiana does not know it.

Mr. NELSON. Certainly it is. The steamboat traffic up and down the river is only nominal; it is a trifle. The shipping of New Orleans is shipping that comes up the river from the ocean and goes back to the ocean, and under the provisions of the bill there is a discrimination, because they are immune from the regulative provisions of section 19 of the bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. I understand that the question as to whether certain commerce is ocean-going or internal must be determined by where that commerce is carried in the main. The big commerce out of New Orleans travels for 108 miles on the river. Then it goes on the Gulf of Mexico and on the Atlantic Ocean, perhaps on the Pacific Ocean, for thousands of miles. It is not river commerce; it is ocean commerce; it is commerce on the high seas, though it does travel for a small portion of the distance on that river, that estuary at the mouth of the river, that portion of the sea to that extent, for it is as deep almost as the sea up to the city of New Orleans, as you know, after you cross the bar. The distinguishing factor is, What kind of commerce is it? Is it commerce carried on internal waters or commerce carried on the high seas? Surely the great ocean commerce that passes from Philadelphia out to the sea is just as far, practically, from the sea as New Orleans. That is ocean-going commerce if it goes out on the ocean. If it is commerce merely on the Delaware River and on the bay or commerce, for instance, between Philadelphia and the city of Baltimore, that is not commerce on the high seas. But the ocean part of the commerce in the big ships I contend is just as much commerce on the high seas as that out of New York, or Boston, or Norfolk, or any of the great deep-water harbors.

Mr. NELSON. Why do you put in the term "high seas"? What is that for?

Mr. RANSDELL. That is to indicate commerce on the sea beyond the 3-mile limit.

Mr. NELSON. But you have two kinds of commerce at New Orleans. You have ships coming from foreign countries with their imports and going to foreign countries with their exports.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is true.

Mr. NELSON. They are engaged in foreign commerce; but then you come to the matter of inland commerce—that is, commerce between the different States. Let me read this language to the Senator and see how plain it is:

> The term "common carrier by water in interstate commerce" means a common carrier engaged in the transportation by water of passengers or property on the high seas.

You can not claim for New Orleans that it is on the high seas, nor that it is any estuary of the high seas.

Mr. RANSDELL. But I do claim that the commerce, while it starts on the river, has to go out and travel much farther on the high seas than it travels on the river in order to get to its destination.

Let us assume that a vessel is going from New Orleans to New York. It travels 108 miles on the river. Then it goes out in the Gulf of Mexico, passes away beyond the 3-mile limit, and travels on to New York way out of the 3-mile limit, I think, for something like 2,000 miles. Now, 2,000 miles of that voyage has been certainly on the high seas beyond the 3-mile limit. Will the Senator say that the commerce is determined by 108 miles of its journey or by 2,000 miles of its journey?

Mr. NELSON. There was a great demand which came from citizens of New Orleans and from the river towns to give them immunity from the provisions of this paragraph, and it was in order to give them immunity, in order to relieve them from the rules governing this class of shipping, provided in section 19, that that term "on the high seas" was injected. If that term was not in it, you would have no preference on the river. If the phrase "on the high seas or the Great Lakes" was not there, shipping at New Orleans would be exactly in the condition of our other coastwise shipping and would be subject to the regulations of section 19 and the other provisions of the bill. It was in order to give your river towns immunity that the phrase "on the high seas or the Great Lakes" was inserted, and the Senator knows it.

Mr. RANSDELL. I must differ respectfully with the Senator. It was to give immunity to internal commerce, commerce on the rivers of the land, but not the ocean-going portion of the commerce, to commerce carried by steamboats, as those that ply up the Ohio, for instance, the upper Mississippi, the Missouri, the Columbia, the upper Hudson, the lower Mississippi above New Orleans, the Red and all the various internal rivers of the country or the internal commerce carried on vessels other than ocean-going vessels. That is the way I understood it.

Mr. NELSON. Then let me ask the Senator, Have you any objection to striking out the term "on the high seas"?

Mr. RANSDELL. Certainly, I have objection to striking it out.

Mr. NELSON. Why do you object to it?

Mr. RANSDELL. Because I want to regulate commerce on the high seas.

Mr. NELSON. But not on the rivers?

Mr. RANSDELL. I think it stands on a very different footing.

Mr. NELSON. To show the Senator's good faith in this matter, if he wants to put his port in the same condition as the other ports in the coastwise trade, let him move to strike that out, and then there will be equality and a parity.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am entirely willing to put in the words the Senator wants to put in there, showing that New Orleans is included under the term "high seas."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OWEN in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I rise to announce the absence on official business of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and I desire to state that he is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, has the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] voted, or has his pair been announced with another Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina has not voted.

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. LIPPITT. I have a general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], but I am informed that I can transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. I will therefore make that transfer and vote "yea."

BILLS OF LADING.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 19) relating to bills of lading in interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, several days ago I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House, requested a conference with the House, and appointed conferees on the part of the Senate, and that the House be requested to return the message to the Senate. I now withdraw that motion, and in lieu thereof I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, we have no knowledge of what those amendments are.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is this the bill-of-lading measure?

Mr. POMERENE. It is the bill-of-lading measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to concur in the House amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendments be read, Mr. President. We have no knowledge whatever of the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendments to the bill proposed by the House of Representatives.

The Secretary read the amendments of the House of Representatives, which were, on page 2, line 6, after "act," insert "unless upon its face and in writing agreed to by the shipper"; page 4, line 3, strike out "An" and insert "possession of the bill of lading and an"; page 7, line 3, after "loss," insert "theft"; page 7, line 4, strike out semicolon; page 7, line 8, strike out "the" and insert "The"; page 7, line 9, after "fees," insert "Provided, That a voluntary indemnifying bond without order of court shall be binding on the parties thereto"; page 9, line 6, after "him," insert "or in case of bulk freight and freight not concealed by packages the description made by him"; page 9, strike out lines 9 to 22, both inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 21. That when package freight or bulk freight is loaded by a shipper and the goods are described in a bill of lading merely by a statement of marks or labels upon them or upon packages containing them, or by a statement that the goods are said to be goods of a certain kind or quantity, or in a certain condition, or it is stated in the bill of lading that packages are said to contain goods of a certain kind or quantity or in a certain condition, or that the contents or condition of the contents of packages are unknown, or words of like purport are contained in the bill of lading, such statements, if true, shall not make liable the carrier issuing the bill of lading, although the goods are not of the kind or quantity or in the condition which the marks or labels upon them indicate, or of the kind or quantity or in the condition they were said to be by the consignor. The carrier may also by inserting in the bill of lading the words "Shipper's weight, load, and count," or other words of like purport indicate that the goods were loaded by the shipper and the description of them made by him; and if such statement be true, the carrier shall not be liable for damages caused by the improper loading or by the nonreceipt or by the misdescription of the goods described in the bill of lading: Provided, however, Where the shipper of bulk freight installs and maintains adequate facilities for weighing such freight, and the same are available to the carrier, then the carrier, upon written request of such shipper and when given a reasonable opportunity so to do, shall ascertain the kind and quantity of bulk freight within a reasonable time after such written request, and the carriers shall not in such cases insert in the bill of lading the words "Shipper's weight," or other words of like purport, and if so inserted contrary to the provisions of this section, said words shall be treated as null and void and as if not inserted therein.

On page 10, lines 1 and 2, strike out "the issuing of bills of lading" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the receiving of goods and issuing bills of lading therefor for transportation in commerce among the several States and with foreign nations"; page 10, lines 2 and 3, strike out "the consignee named in a straight bill" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the owner of goods covered by a straight bill subject to existing right of stoppage in transitu"; page 11, line 2, strike out "no" and insert "a"; page 11, line 2, strike out "except"; page 11, line 2, after "for," insert "all"; page 11, line 6, after the word "bill," where it first occurs, insert "and all other charges incurred in transportation and delivery"; page 12, line 8, after "negotiated," insert "free from existing equities"; page 16, line 23, after "lading," insert "purporting to represent goods received for shipment among the several States or with foreign nations"; page 17, strike out lines 14 to 16, both inclusive; page 17, line 17, strike out "43" and insert "42"; page 18, strike out line 9; page 18, strike out line 14; page 18, strike out lines 17 to 19, both inclusive; page 18, line 20, strike out "44" and insert "43"; page 18, line 22, strike out "45" and insert "44"; page 19, line 4, strike out "46" and insert "45."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. Is the shipper compelled to take such a bill of lading as is prescribed in the bill, or can he refuse to do so? If the carrier can impose such a bill of lading upon the shipper as is prescribed in the bill, I do not see but that the shipper is entirely at the carrier's mercy, and, if so, we have not made any progress in this matter.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the shipper is no more, and not so much, at the mercy of the carrier as he is under the present state of the law. I very much prefer the Senate provision, and I should like to see it adopted. The feature of shipper's load and count is only one of the many features of the bill. It is going to be impossible to get this legislation through at this session unless we accept the amendments made by the other House. I have satisfied myself of that, and I think that other Senators agree with me upon that subject.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will excuse me for just a moment, as I feel about this matter now I think that this bill should be adopted because of the other features contained in it, and I shall be glad to join with other Senators in seeking at the beginning of the next session to get the shipper's load and count in the shape we have been contending for.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that, as I heard the provision read, the only exception to the imposition of such a bill of lading as is prescribed in the bill upon the shipper is in cases where there are scales on which the goods may be weighed, and the shipper then must make a written request to have them weighed. An oral request would not be sufficient. That is the only exception, and so I do not see that much advantage will be derived from the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator has overlooked the first part of the provision. Section 21 of the bill, as the Senate adopted it, reads:

SEC. 21. That when goods are loaded by a shipper, at a place where the carrier maintains an agency, such carrier shall, on written request of such shipper, and when given a reasonable opportunity by the shipper so to do, count the packages of goods if package freight and ascertain the kind and quantity of bulk freight, within a reasonable time after such written request, and such carrier shall not, in such cases, insert in the bill of lading, or in any notice, receipt, contract, rule, regulation, or tariff, "Shipper's weight, load, and count," or other words of like purport indicating that the goods were loaded by the shipper and the description of them made by him. If so inserted, contrary to the provisions of this section, said words shall be treated as null and void and as if not inserted therein.

The substitute for that section incorporated by the House reads as follows:

SEC. 21. That when package freight or bulk freight is loaded by a shipper and the goods are described in a bill of lading merely by a statement of marks or labels upon them or upon packages containing them, or by a statement that the goods are said to be goods of a certain kind or quantity, or in a certain condition, or it is stated in the bill of lading that packages are said to contain goods of a certain kind or quantity or in a certain condition, or that the contents or condition of the contents of packages are unknown, or words of like purport are contained in the bill of lading, such statements, if true, shall not make liable the carrier issuing the bill of lading, although the goods are not of the kind or quantity or in the condition which the marks or labels upon them indicate, or of the kind or quantity or in the condition they were said to be by the consignor. The carrier may also by inserting in the bill of lading the words "Shipper's weight, load, and count," or other words of like purport indicate that the goods were loaded by the shipper and the description of them made by him; and if such statement be true, the carrier shall not be liable for damages caused by the improper loading or by the nonreceipt or by the misdescription of the goods described in the bill of lading: Provided, however, Where the shipper of bulk freight installs and maintains adequate facilities for weighing such freight, and the same are available to the carrier, then the carrier, upon written request of such shipper and when given a reasonable opportunity so to do, shall ascertain the kind and quantity of bulk freight within a reasonable time after such written request, and the carriers shall not in such cases insert in the bill of lading the words "Shipper's weight," or other words of like purport, and if so inserted contrary to the provisions of this section, said words shall be treated as null and void and as if not inserted therein.

I recognize the fact that the House provision is not as satisfactory as the Senate provision, but I am satisfied it is the best we can get at this session of Congress. I have conferred as to this matter with other Senators who have been interested in it and who gave very great attention to it in the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and, after hearing from Members of the House of Representatives, I am sure those Senators agree with me that if we are to have legislation on this subject at this session it must be in the present form.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator from Ohio believe that, on the whole, the situation will be very much benefited by the passage of this bill? I understand him to state very frankly that he is not satisfied with the bill in the form in which it was passed by the other House.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, undoubtedly; there can be no question about it being a very great improvement upon the present law relating to bills of lading. I have had a number of letters from men who have studied this question who regret that the Senate provision was not adopted; but I think, with the exception of one association in Chicago, they have all urged that the bill in its present form be adopted, rather than fail. We can take the other matter up later.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that I do not understand that the failure to pass the bill at this session means a failure of the legislation, because the short session is soon to follow—perhaps almost as soon as we adjourn the present session—and it would seem to me better to let the bill go over and take it up at the next session in order that we may have it nearer right.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. Now, here is one of the troubles—and there are others. You leave it entirely with the common carriers to say whether or not they shall afford standard facilities for loading, at some point on their system, a certain amount of freight. There they avoid all responsibility by marking the shipment "shipper's weight," and so forth, when, as a matter of right, the carrier should afford necessary facilities. It operates in this way: A great many commodities are bought and payment made as they are weighed into the cars, and the bills of lading are attached to a draft. The draft goes forward, and the consignee pays for the goods on the guarantee that he is getting the goods as described from the consignor, the shipper, and the railroad that receives it. Now, it is quite possible for a railroad to avoid all of that.

Take, for instance, the matter of wool. It goes in sacks plainly showing what it is. It is always weighed in by a railroad agent, and whether the railroad furnishes the scales or whether the shipper furnishes the scales makes no difference if the railroad accepts the weight of those scales, even though the railroad has not standard facilities or a regular agent constantly stationed there. I do not know why they should not be as responsible, whether they furnish the scales, and so forth, or not, if they accept the weight and description. They never allow a shipper to load the wool and accept it as such without having present some temporary or regular agent of the road, and they should not do it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, this bill provides that where the shipper of bulk freight installs and maintains adequate facilities for weighing such freight, and the same are available to the carrier, then the carrier must weigh it.

Mr. WARREN. But here is what they do: They erect a platform where there is no station and they either provide a little movable platform scale or the shipper does, and they send their agent there and ship the wool, and the billing is made from some other town. What would the Senator say as to whether that constituted "proper facilities" or not?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I would not presume to pass upon that question.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator can see where the question of proper facilities comes up.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator can get no quarrel with me as to the respective merits of those proposals.

Mr. WARREN. I would not have any quarrel with the Senator under any circumstances.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, surely; I admit that; I spoke good-naturedly, of course. I realize very fully what I believe is the great merit of the Senate provision; but this bill has been traveling a pretty rocky road. The Senate has passed it three different times, and each time when it got over to the House we never were able to get it out of the committee until very recently. After a number of hearings over there—and the committee went into it very thoroughly—there was some little objection to it on the part of certain Members of the House committee, but it finally passed the House in its present form, and I think there are only probably two amendments here to which I can take exception. One—and the principal one—is this "shipper's load and count" provision. But I am convinced that we would be making a serious mistake if we did not take this bill as it came over; and then, with further study of it, perhaps we can get those who favor as well as those who are opposed to this shipper's load and count provision to have it whipped into a shape that will meet the approval of everybody.

Mr. WARREN. That is what I want to be assured of by the Senator on behalf of his committee; because the Senator, I know, sees, and anyone who is in the habit of shipping or receiving freight knows, that there is a great wide-open, uncertain place that interferes very materially with the due course of business and gives opportunities for a carrier to avoid the responsibility it should take. I should like to be assured that the Senator will take it up again.

Mr. POMERENE. We want to prevent all that. Of course the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is here, and he has given a vast deal of attention to this bill; so have the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and others; but I think we would all agree that we prefer the Senate provision, and I, for one, will not be satisfied until we get it. I think that can be taken up later, and that we can get it in such shape during the coming session that everybody will be satisfied with it.

Mr. WARREN. With that assurance from the Senator—and I know how much time and ability he has given the bill—I do not feel like opposing it; but I should certainly feel like opposing it, and opposing it strenuously, unless we have some rainbow of hope that very soon in the future we may make up for what is lacking in this measure, not only the point we have just discussed, but the matter of obliging railroads to always fully protect their through bills of lading, thus covering consignee and consignor against later attacks.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator can rest assured that there will be something along that line.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to ask the Senator if he has taken into consideration how this bill would affect those who have to ship commodities in bulk?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes. This whole matter has been thrashed out in every conceivable way, and I can not express myself otherwise than I have thus far.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator knows that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the common carriers have no scales whatever.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator is correct; that is, at the distant points in the country, where, for instance, there may be lumber loaded or something of that kind.

Mr. GRONNA. Or grain of all kinds.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; I think that is, perhaps, true.

Mr. GRONNA. Under the present system and under the present rule, when a carload of grain is being shipped out it is generally weighed by the elevators; but we compel the railroad companies, the common carriers, to pay for leakage, because it has been weighed by the elevator men. Under the provisions of this bill the common carrier is made immune, and would not have to pay for the loss of grain in transit.

Mr. POMERENE. No; I think not.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say that I am opposed to this bill, and I hope we will be given the right to have a record vote on it. It ought not to pass in the present form.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. JONES. I do not know very much about this bill. I am not a member of the committee; but I have a great deal of confidence in the judgment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who have given this matter a great deal of attention, I know.

As I understand, the provisions from which the Senate is practically receding the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee think are quite important, and much preferable to the House provisions. It is suggested that the bill should go through now, and that we can take it up at the next session. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] suggested that the next session is not very far away—only two or three months, at the outside.

Now, if the provisions on which the Senate is giving way are to be taken up as a separate measure, and there is considerable objection to them in another body, there will not be very much hope of getting through such a bill as a separate measure in the next session; so it occurs to me that we would not lose a great deal by delaying the matter two or three months, and that the chances of getting this provision worked out in good shape would be a good deal better with all the other provisions in the bill.

I have no doubt the Senator has given that question consideration, and if his judgment is to the contrary of course I will not make any objection.

Mr. POMERENE. I have, Mr. President. Of course, I can not anticipate exactly what would happen if the whole bill were to go over until the next session; neither can I anticipate what may happen, either in the Senate or in the House, if we limit the new bill which we have in mind to the subject of shippers' load and count. I do know, however, from a very considerable study of this matter, that objectionable though this section of the bill is, there are so many other provisions in it that are going to be of very great benefit to the commerce of the country that it would be little short of a calamity if this bill did not pass now.

To illustrate: I referred the other day to the rule that has been announced in the Friedlander case. The Senator will remember that our Supreme Court has repeatedly held, and probably the last time in the Friedlander case, that where a freight agent issues a bill of lading without receiving the goods, and the bill of lading is negotiated as collateral at some bank and gets into the hands of an innocent holder, the railroad can make the defense that the act of the agent was ultra vires, in that he had no right to issue a bill of lading without receiving the goods called for therein, and can thereby avoid liability.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. Has the Senator any idea how that will affect the shipper of grain or the shipper of any other commodity, if we pass this bill?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, my judgment is that it will leave him in somewhat better condition than he is in at the present time, but not in as good condition as I should like to have him.

Mr. GRONNA. Will it not also relieve the common carrier from any responsibility?

Mr. POMERENE. Why no; I think not, except upon the terms provided for herein.

Mr. GRONNA. Why, yes; therefore we are better off without the bill. We would be better off with present conditions than with the bill as proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. No; not by any means. I must differ from the Senator in that respect.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am opposed to this bill in its present form. I believe it is a bill absolutely in the interest of the banker and the common carrier. I know something about how this business is transacted. Where a bill of lading is made out, and a draft made upon that bill of lading, this bill would to a large extent prevent and prohibit those who ship goods and take the bill of lading and make a draft upon it from getting money on it at all.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has said that this is an improvement. The Senator from Ohio can not show that it is an improvement nor that it is a benefit to anyone except the banks and the common carriers. I challenge any Senator on this floor to show that this is a benefit to the shipper. On the contrary, it is going to be a disadvantage. It is going to be a disadvantage from two points of view: First, you will practically prohibit the shipper from drawing a draft upon a bill of lading, because no banker will be foolish enough to honor that draft with these words, "shipper's weight, load, and count," written upon the face of that bill of lading. In the second place, Mr. President, the carrier will not be held responsible for any of the leakage; and in the grain trade I want to say to you that that amounts to millions of dollars every year in our State alone.

Mr. President, I know how hopeless it is to try to prevent legislation that is being enacted nowadays by the present administration. I suppose it is absolutely useless for anyone to raise his voice against any of these measures; but I want to assure the Senator from Ohio that he and other Senators who have been instrumental in perfecting this bill will hear from the shippers when this bill has taken effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN in the chair). The question is on concurring in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GRONNA. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the request seconded? [A pause.] It is not seconded by a sufficient number.

Mr. GRONNA. I think more than a fifth of the Senators present have seconded the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments of the House.

The amendments were concurred in.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15455) to establish a United States shipping board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes.

The SECRETARY. The question is on the reported amendment of the committee on page 2, line 4.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the words "Great Lakes" the words "on regular routes from port to port."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the words "Great Lakes," on line 4 and line 11, it is proposed to insert "on regular routes from port to port."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I want to pursue the regular course and have the committee amendments acted on first, and then have the others offered. This is practically an amendment to the amendment, however——

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. And I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 14, after the word "forwarding," to strike out "ferrying, towing"; in line 15, after the word "furnishing," to strike out "transfer, lighterage"; and in line 16, after the word "facilities," to strike out "in or," so as to make the clause read:

The term "other person subject to this act" means any person not included in the term "common carrier by water," carrying on the business of forwarding or furnishing wharfage, dock, warehouse, or other terminal facilities in connection with a common carrier by water.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to ask whether an amendment would now be in order striking out any of the other words in that paragraph, or whether the Senator would prefer to let that go over?

Mr. FLETCHER. I should prefer to let that go over.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 3, line 10, after the words "composed of," to strike out "the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of Commerce, as members ex officio, and"; so as to make the clause read:

That a board is hereby created, to be known as the United States Shipping Board, and hereinafter referred to as the board. The board shall be composed of five commissioners, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; said board shall annually elect one of its members as chairman and one as vice chairman.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 4, line 16, after the word "board," to strike out "except the ex officio members"; so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 4. That each member of the board shall receive a salary of $10,000 per annum. The board shall appoint a secretary, at a salary of $5,000 per annum, and employ and fix the compensation of such attorneys, officers, naval architects, special experts, examiners, clerks, and other employees as it may find necessary for the proper performance of its duties and as may be appropriated for by the Congress. The President, upon the request of the board, may authorize the detail of officers of the military, naval, or other services of the United States for such duties as the board may deem necessary in connection with its business.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 6, line 3, after the word "purposes," to insert: "and to make necessary repairs on and alterations of such vessels: Provided, That neither the board nor any corporation formed under section 11 in which the United States is then a stockholder shall purchase, lease, or charter any vessel—

"(a) Which is then engaged in the foreign or domestic commerce of the United States, unless it is about to be withdrawn from such commerce without any intention on the part of the owner to return it thereto within a reasonable time;

"(b) Which is under the registry or flag of a foreign country which is then engaged in war;

"(c) Which is not adapted, or can not by reasonable alterations and repairs be adapted, to the purposes specified in this section;

"(d) Which, upon expert examination made under the direction of the board, a written report of such examination being filed as a public record, is not without alteration or repair found to be at least 75 per cent as efficient as at the time it was originally put in commission as a seaworthy vessel," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 5. That the board, with the approval of the President, is authorized to have constructed and equipped in American shipyards and navy yards or elsewhere, giving preference, other things being equal, to domestic yards, or to purchase, lease, or charter, vessels suitable, as far as the commercial requirements of the marine trade of the United States may permit, for use as naval auxiliaries or Army transports, or for other naval or military purposes, and to make necessary repairs on and alterations of such vessels: Provided, That neither the board nor any corporation formed under section 11 in which the United States is then a stockholder shall purchase, lease, or charter any vessel—

(a) Which is then engaged in the foreign or domestic commerce of the United States, unless it is about to be withdrawn from such commerce without any intention on the part of the owner to return it thereto within a reasonable time;

(b) Which is under the registry or flag of a foreign country which is then engaged in war;

(c) Which is not adapted, or can not by reasonable alterations and repairs be adapted, to the purposes specified in this section;

(d) Which, upon expert examination made under the direction of the board, a written report of such examination being filed as a public record, is not without alteration or repair found to be at least 75 per cent as efficient as at the time it was originally put in commission as a seaworthy vessel.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, just a word.

I think this amendment, taken as a whole, improves paragraph 5 very considerably. Personally, I should much prefer to have had a rearrangement of section 5, so as to make the auxiliary features of these vessels the primary purpose for which we are going to spend this $50,000,000, and then have them constructed, as they might be without interfering with that purpose, so as to make them adaptable for commercial needs. But the committee would not consider that proposition, and I am satisfied that the Senate would not vote contrary to the report of the committee in that respect.

I was also very anxious to cut out this proposition of purchasing or leasing or chartering ships. My idea is that if the Government is going to spend any money to get ships it ought to spend it for the building of ships, so that it will know that the ships that it gets will be new ships and that they will be additional ships to the carrying facilities of the world, and I should like to see this money all spent at home for American labor and for American materials.

I have already expressed my views with reference to the special terms of the bill. I should like to have seen the provision with reference to the construction of these ships in domestic yards and elsewhere made more restrictive than it is, so that there will be scarcely any question but that any new ships we do build or have built will be built in American shipyards. I doubt very much whether the ships that we have built under this section after normal times come to us will be built in American yards; but the limitation put on by the committee by way of amendment practically eliminates the purchase of ships, and confines the operation of this section in a practical way to the building of ships and the expenditure of the money that we appropriate herein for that purpose. Therefore I am glad to see these amendments put on, because of the limitations that they impose upon the right of the board to purchase ships abroad.

The provision with reference to the purchase of ships under registry of a foreign country engaged in war I think is a very important one. It was probably much more important when the other bill was pending than it is now. Possibly, if it had been put in then, we would not have had this trouble at this time. We probably would have ended it before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, page 7, line 16, after the word "licensed" to insert "or both registered and enrolled and licensed."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have an amendment to that. I move to strike out, in the amendment, in line 16, after the word "registered," the words "or enrolled and licensed, or both registered and enrolled and licensed," so that, if amended, it will read:

That any vessel purchased, chartered, or leased from the board may be registered as a vessel of the United States and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining thereto.

The object of that is to exclude these vessels from the coastwise trade.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. HARDING. I am wondering if the Senator from Minnesota would not allow the completion of the reading of the section. Then I will submit an amendment that will make all the changes necessary to cover this point. If that is agreeable to the Senator——

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I suggest to the Senator that we are adopting these amendments as we go along.

Mr. HARDING. As I understand, the amendments to a section are adopted; are they not?

Mr. JONES. We are adopting each amendment as we come to it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I did not understand that the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota had been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. The Chair understood that the Senator from Minnesota had withdrawn his amendment, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio that he would offer a substitute.

Mr. HARDING. I only asked that on condition that when the section is completed I may offer an amendment covering those matters in the different parts of the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can; certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Under those circumstances I shall offer my amendment now, to strike out the words "or enrolled and licensed, or both registered and enrolled and licensed."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think the question would come up first on agreeing to the committee amendment. If the committee amendment is agreed to, then it would clearly indicate that the purpose is to have these vessels registered and enrolled. If the Senate amendment is rejected, then the Senator's amendment would be in order.

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection if my amendment will be in order after the committee amendment has been agreed to, but while that amendment is pending it is subject to amendment, and my amendment is to strike that out, together with some other words.

Mr. FLETCHER. But the Senator can not strike out something that has not been put in. The first thing would be to act on the amendment of the committee, it seems to me.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think the Senator is wrong about that. While there may have been an agreement—I do not know whether there was or not—to act first upon committee amendments, there is no doubt that the committee amendments are amendable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The difficulty is that the Senator from Minnesota is not offering an amendment to the committee amendment. He is offering an amendment to strike out part of the text of the bill, and the Chair thinks——

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh! I beg pardon.

Mr. NELSON. My motion is to strike out the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment has not been agreed to yet.

Mr. NELSON. I move to amend the committee amendment—I will put it in that form—by striking out those words, "or enrolled and licensed, or both registered and enrolled and licensed."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those words are not in the committee amendment. The Senator can get at it by moving to strike the words "or enrolled and licensed" out of the text of the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. The only comment I have to make on that is that I would prefer that the amendments of the committee be first acted on. Then amendments can be offered from the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator from Ohio, he has what he will propose as a substitute for the various amendments proposed by the committee to this section.

Mr. HARDING. Covering the entire section.

Mr. JONES. Yes. Therefore I want to ask whether the Senator from Florida would have any objection to having all of section 9 read and then permitting the Senator from Ohio to offer his amendment as a substitute for the various amendments proposed by the committee?

Mr. FLETCHER. I should think that would be all right; but let us first perfect the section according to the committee amendments, and then we can offer the other as a substitute for the whole.

Mr. JONES. I did not understand that the Senator from Ohio had a substitute for the entire section.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, the amendment which I will propose affects both the bill as submitted to the Senate and the committee amendments; and it would be a very simple matter, after the reading of the section, to offer the amendment correcting the phraseology of the entire section. Then it would clear up this whole question in one submission of the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. That would cover the first paragraph of section 9.

Mr. HARDING. My amendment covers both the first paragraph of section 9 and the fourth paragraph.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not see why we could not go on and act upon the committee amendment as proposed, and then afterwards the Senator would have a right to offer his as a substitute for the whole.

Mr. HARDING. I have no objection to that method of getting at it if the Senator from Florida will not object to my offering this amendment when the committee amendment is completed.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The matter may be made plain by the Senator from Ohio offering his amendment now as a substitute for the entire section. Then we shall have the privilege of amending the original text and subsequently to amend the text of the Senator's amendment, and then the question will come on the motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. HARDING. Very well; I submit the following.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota withdraw his amendment?

Mr. NELSON. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, section 9, line 16, strike out the words "or enrolled and licensed"; on page 7, line 17, strike out the words "or both registered and enrolled and licensed"; on page 8, line 2, reinsert after the word "may" the word "not"; on page 8, line 9, strike out the words "or enrollment and license"; and on page 9, line 1, strike out the words "or enrolled and licensed."

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, the suggested change of language for the bill, if written into section 9, will accomplish the purpose of denying the enrollment or license of foreign-built vessels either purchased or leased in the American coastwise trade. Having somewhat discussed this question before three or four Senators the other day, I will not attempt to enter into a lengthy argument at this time. I only want to make a final appeal to this body that we let alone the one splendidly established branch of the American merchant marine which has been built up under a fostering protective policy.

I am very much opposed to the entry of foreign-built ships, of ships purchased or leased from foreign owners, into this line of American shipping. I know of no call for it. I should like to relieve from the operations of the proposed law this one branch of water shipping in which we Americans excel.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I understood the amendment it would not accomplish what the Senator from Ohio has in view. I may not have understood it perfectly. If adopted, the section would read:

That any vessel purchased, chartered, or leased from the board may be registered as a vessel of the United States and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining thereto: Provided, That foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry under this act—

Omitting then some intermediate provision—may engage in the——

Mr. HARDING. "May not." The amendment reinserts the word "not."

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the part I did not catch.

Mr. HARDING. The amendment carries the reinsertion of the word "not." I will be glad to have the Secretary verify it.

The SECRETARY. A part of the amendment, on page 8, line 2, proposes to reinsert, after the word "may," the word "not," and disagree to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator from Ohio that he has not offered a substitute for section 9. He has offered a number of amendments, some of them amendments to the amendments of the committee, some of them restoring language in the House text which the committee amendment strikes out. That question comes up on the question whether the committee amendment shall be agreed to. The Senator from Ohio is in order to offer an amendment to the amendment. He offers to strike out the words "or enrolled and licensed," in line 16. The question is on that amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the motion of the Senator from Ohio to strike out the words "or enrollment and license," on line 9, page 8. [Putting the question.] The noes seeem to have it. The noes have it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dillingham	Lea, Tenn.	Simmons
Bankhead	Fletcher	Lee, Md.	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Gallinger	McLean	Smith, Md.
Borah	Gronna	Martin, Va.	Smoot

Clapp	James	Phelan	Warren
Clarke, Ark.	Johnson, S. Dak.	Ransdell	Weeks
Culberson	Jones	Reed	Works.
Cummins	Kern	Shafroth
Curtis	Lane	Sheppard

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. The Senator from Kansas is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] I want to say that during this entire discussion I have never received any intimation from any person or corporation in New England concerning the advisability of allowing foreign ships to enter the coastwise trade. The opposition to that proposition is universal and is condemned on all hands.

I am not going to occupy the time of the Senate in discussing the matter, because I have gone over that already, but I wish to put in the RECORD a letter from Capt. J. G. Crowley, of the Coastwise Transportation Co., of Boston, a man who has done as much to develop shipping as any other man in this country, who has devoted his life practically to this great interest, and who, in common with all other people in New England, feels a sense of very deep regret that this attempt is being made, regarding it as unnecessary and in the highest degree harmful to the real interests of American shipping. I ask that Capt. Crowley's letter may be read by the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., July 26, 1916.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I wish to enter an earnest protest against part of the Government ship-purchase bill whereby foreign-built ships purchased by the Government will be allowed in the coastwise trade, as I do not think foreign-built ships purchased should be allowed in the coastwise trade to compete with American-built ships.

My company now have 10 ships built in American shipyards and are building 7 more—some of these are for my company and the others are to be managed by this company.

I trust when this bill comes before your honorable body you will use every effort to have this part of the bill stricken out.

Respectfully, yours,

COASTWISE TRANSPORTATION CO.,
J. G. CROWLEY,
General Manager and Treasurer.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I have sent to the desk a substitute for section 9 so written that if adopted it would eliminate entirely the possibility of the enrollment and registry of a foreign-built vessel in the American coastwise trade.

I wish to add just one sentence at this time. I believe the tendency in American legislation has emphasized the fact that there is sometimes greater necessity for preservation than attempted construction, and I want those who believe in an American merchant marine to vote for this measure to preserve that which we now have.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I did not intend to engage in this debate, and I do not desire to delay the passage of the pending bill, but I do not propose to keep my seat and allow the impression to prevail that all the people of the United States believe that the existing laws in reference to a coastwise service are beneficial to the American people. There has been no greater monopoly that has ever been established under the laws of this Government than the monopoly growing out of the laws to protect the coastwise shipping. A part of the people of the United States may have been partially served under existing law, but under existing law there has been a very grave injustice done to many of the people of the United States.

I am not familiar with conditions on the seaboard or the eastern coast, neither am I familiar with conditions on the Great Lakes. On the Great Lakes, of course, all the shipping is coastwise shipping, practically, although a vessel may leave the Great Lakes occasionally for foreign trade. I presume that practically all of it is in the coastwise trade.

I am disposed to believe from what I have heard that there may be fair service on the eastern seaboard, but the man who contends that the present condition of the coastwise shipping trade meets the demands and the needs of the people on the Gulf coast or the people on the Pacific coast is contending for a proposition that the facts do not justify.

To maintain a proposition that we on the Gulf coast may have produce at our ports, that we may have cotton bales lying at New Orleans or Mobile or Pensacola, or pig iron or the other products of our people, ready for shipment to the eastern market that the present coastwise shipping is unable to handle and does not handle, and that we must be compelled to pay the freight rates to the eastern seaboard for the carrying of that freight under present conditions and that there shall be no relief, is contending for a proposition that I stand ready to repudiate. If a foreign tramp steamer comes into a southern port eastward bound we may load it with a cargo going to England or to France, but if we load our cotton or our pig iron aboard that ship going to New York or Boston we are sent to jail for it.

You created this monopoly many years ago. If the development of this industry under your laws had grown to the extent that it was able to serve the people of the United States and carry the freight that they desire shipped by sea in order to carry cheaper freight rather than send it by railroad, in which case they must of necessity pay higher freight, you might justify your position, but you can not justify your position because you have a condition on the eastern seaboard that is not satisfactory and does not serve other portions of the country.

If you intend to continue this monopoly that has existed for 75 years, then your monopoly must serve the people of the United States; but it has not done so. We are entitled to transportation by water that will compete with transportation by rail and enable us to have better and cheaper transportation facilities for the products of our soil and the products of our factories. You seek to deny that to us. You seek to deny it to us by artificial means, by passing laws that make it a criminal act for us to ship our goods in any ships except the ships that are protected by your monopoly. You have had 75 years in which to make good, and you have not made good.

The Republican Party confessed itself that it had not made good when it repealed the coastwise shipping laws in so far as they relate to some of our colonial possessions. You admitted that your law was wrong and could not serve the people. You have heard continual complaint from the Pacific coast that under the coastwise shipping laws you could not get the bottoms to carry the freight from the Pacific coast to the eastern seaboard, and you have had amendments pending before the Senate offered and considered seeking to allow foreign ships to carry goods from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic coast, which, of course, was in contravention of the clause in the Constitution of the United States that forbids you to pass laws discriminating in favor of one port as against another.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama if he does not believe that the repeal of the exemption of American ships from Panama Canal tolls has been the greatest discouragement to the coastwise shipping of the Gulf and the Pacific coasts?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No, I do not; I do not see how that affected it, because we did not have it before we started to build the Panama Canal and we have not got it now. I do not think it has affected the situation in reference to the Gulf coast at all.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator is aware, is he not, that it has materially affected the Pacific coast shipping?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It may have. I admit that I am not familiar with the close details in reference to the Pacific coast.

Mr. HARDING. Then may I ask one other question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The information that I have largely comes out of information I have heard here on the floor of the Senate in reference to the Pacific coast; but I am satisfied that it has not affected the conditions on the Gulf coast, because we did not have the ships before; we have not had them since.

Mr. HARDING. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not believe it would be more effective if we took a means of encouraging further American development than it would be to admit foreign-built ships, which might destroy that which we already have?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have never believed that the admission of ships to the American marine would destroy American shipping interests. It may affect American shipyards. Whether the ship is built somewhere else or built in an American yard, if it is owned by an American citizen, manned by an American crew, and flies the American flag, it is an American ship, and the only controversy is the question where you build it. What I object to is your insisting in season and out of season on building up American shipyards at the expense of the great commercial and business interests of the United States. You throttle commerce for the purpose of building up shipyards. That is my objection to it.

Now, I expect to support this bill, but I am free to say that the lines of the bill have never, to my mind, been the solution of this problem. The question of building up an American merchant marine is no new problem to me. I stood for the building of an American merchant marine 15 years or more ago. At that time there were few men on the side of the House to which I belonged who were in favor of the proposition. I stand for it to-day.

However, the question of building a merchant marine is not a question that is confronting the American people. We are confronted by the question of maintaining an American merchant marine, owned by American citizens, officered by American seamen, and flying the American flag. That is what we want. It is not a question of building the ships; it is maintaining the ships.

I have always believed that if you want an American merchant marine to fly the American flag, you have got to put that merchant marine on the same basis as its competitors. If our foreign competitors who come fighting for the commerce of the world are to receive subventions from their Governments; if they are to receive discriminations from their Governments; if the rate of wages paid to their seamen is less than the rate of wages which we pay to our seamen, we have to meet those conditions to keep American ships on the seas. If we do not meet those conditions, we may build all the ships that we can build with all the money in the Treasury, and yet when normal conditions return those ships will leave the seas, unless the Government of the United States runs them at a loss, which would be the same thing as a subvention.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. I like the doctrine which the Senator from Alabama is just now preaching, but I want to ask him a question. Why adopt that plan of favoring American shipping to the extent of making equal the conditions between American and foreign shipping, and not provide for making conditions equal in American shipbuilding?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I have no objection to making conditions equal for American shipbuilding. My friend from Ohio, whom I admire greatly, belongs to a party that has always played favorites; and going with his party column he could not help from playing favorites. The Senator's education along tariff lines for a protective tariff is to favor one industry at the cost of the balance of the people. You propose to do it in this same proposition. You have a coastwise shipping monopoly that serves your people under your laws, and because it does serve your people under your laws you are satisfied and want to continue those conditions, irrespective of the fact that there are other people in the United States who are suffering from your laws and are not being served by your monopoly. I am perfectly willing to put them all on the same basis.

I stood for a law, when the present tariff law was passed, giving a discriminating duty in favor of goods shipped in American bottoms; and that law is now on the statute books. The General Board of Appraisers decided in favor of it, and the question was appealed to the Court of Customs Appeals. In the main they decided for it, not as fully as had the General Board of Appraisers, but they declared in favor of it. Now it has been appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. What may be the decision there, I do not know; but, nevertheless, so far as I am concerned and so far as the Sixty-third Congress is concerned—a Democratic Congress—we wrote on the statute books a law to discriminate in favor of American ships flying the American flag and owned by American owners. I believe if the law had been put into effect, to-day you would not have to pass this bill.

More than that, I have stood for the proposition of favoring a discrimination at the Panama Canal in favor of American ships, contending that that canal was built for the American people, to advance American commerce, to bring the people of the Gulf of Mexico and of the Atlantic seaboard into closer contact commercially with the people of the Pacific coast. I favored the provision to give American ships a discrimination. So far as I am concerned, I believe it violated no treaty and was a fair discrimination in favor of American shipping, because our great competitors were paying subsidies at the Suez Canal that equaled the discrimination that we would have given at Panama. If we are going to allow them to discriminate in favor of their ships, we must discriminate in favor of our ships if we intend to keep them on the seas.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just let me finish my sentence. That law, however, was repealed, and it was repealed by your votes. You repealed it; I did not. Now, I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rose to suggest to the Senator that I do not think the Republican Party could be held responsible for repealing that law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But they were particeps criminis.

Mr. GALLINGER. But it was a Democratic President who insisted that it should be done, and the Democratic Party certainly contributed a much larger proportion of votes than did the Republicans to its repeal.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know that they contributed a larger proportion of the votes. I differed with the President and I differed with my party at the time the law was repealed, and I have not changed my mind about that proposition. My party platform declared in favor of the discrimination, and if that did not announce my party's position I do not know who had the right to announce it.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is quite right, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me; but, unfortunately, a large proportion of his party associates did not take the view which the Senator did, nor did the Senator's President take that view, and hence the law was repealed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I admit that as an historical fact, but I say that Senators on your side of the Chamber are just as much responsible. Your leaders on the committee before the repeal fought for the repeal. It was an opportunity to discriminate in favor of American ships, and you refused so to discriminate.

Now, I say it is idle to talk about building up a merchant marine, keeping a few ships flying the American flag, most of which in the past have been controlled by the great railroad interests of this country, and saying that you are keeping up an American merchant marine to serve the American people, when you have a close combine that is not formed to reduce freight rates, but to maintain freight rates.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator from Alabama remember what the vote was on the proposition to repeal the exemption from tolls clause in the statute that had been enacted? I do not myself remember.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not remember. I am free to say, though, that in the other House the bill was passed by a large majority, and I think it had a large majority in the Senate. That, however, did not change my view in reference to the proposition at all.

Mr. WORKS. I remember very distinctly that I was opposed to the repeal and voted against it, but I am not certain now what proportion there was upon each side of the Chamber on the proposition. I thought the Senator from Alabama might remember.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the proposition I am making is this: You pretend that you are standing for American ships and for the upbuilding of an American merchant marine, and yet when the test comes in the only logical way that you can maintain it, you vote against it.

You know as well as I do that in maintaining this little coastwise shipping monopoly you are not building an American merchant marine in the interests of the American people. If you want to build a great merchant marine, you have to go beyond that; you have to reach out and take control of the seas. If you have control of the seas in the foreign trade for American ships, you will have plenty of American ships to carry your coastwise trade. You know as well as I do that the mere appropriation of money to build ships is not going to build up an American merchant marine, but that you have got to maintain them; and if you do not maintain them you have not accomplished any result. You will not have accomplished it for the people in the coastwise trade, and you will not have accomplished it in the foreign trade. It is idle for men who are on the other side of this Chamber to contend that they are in favor of building up an American merchant marine for the benefit of the American people, when they do not vote for the only kind of law that will maintain an American merchant marine.

So far as the provision in this bill is concerned, I am in favor of its staying in, and if you are in favor of building up an American merchant marine you would be in favor of it staying in. I do not think you are going to build up an American merchant marine by spending $50,000,000 to buy ships or to build ships; but I think it can be useful, and that you will not lose your money, on one condition; and that is, that you allow them to be used in the coastwise shipping trade. Competition is what you do not want; you do not want anybody to compete with the ships that you have now floating on the seas. Evidently you do not want any new ships.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What does the Senator mean when he constantly uses the word "you"?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am talking about the gentlemen who want to maintain the coastwise shipping monopoly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Where do they live, Mr. President?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What objection have you to having more ships? If you take this $50,000,000 and build $50,000,000 worth of ships in American shipyards, they can compete with the ships that are already afloat so far as shipping is concerned. If you buy $50,000,000 worth of ships, you will have no greater competition than if you built them.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. Will not the Senator from Alabama qualify his statement in that regard? I think it is clear to him that there is no one on this side of the Chamber who wants to buy fifty or sixty million dollars' worth of ships?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I realize that. I said a moment ago you did not; but what I am contending is that there is no distinction between buying and building them. I realize that you do not want to either buy or build them, so far as the Government of the United States is concerned.

I say, if we buy or build $50,000,000 worth of ships which can only be used in the foreign trade, that when the present European war is over and normal conditions return to the shipping of the world, American shipping will not be able to compete with lines of ships that pay cheaper wages than are paid to American seamen, that are given subsidies when they go through the canals of the world, that are given discriminations in the form of loans of cheap money for their building, and that are in receipt of large mail subsidies for their maintenance. Under such circumstances American ships have not been able to compete with foreign ships in the past, and they will not be able to compete with them in the future, unless there is a change in the laws in reference to the maintenance and operation of American ships.

You, my Republican friends, did not remedy that condition in the past; you admit, as everybody admits, that you did not do it during the 40 or 50 years when you had control of the enactment and execution of laws. Of course, some headway can be made while the war is on; but when normal conditions return, you are bound to admit that American ships can not be maintained in competition with foreign vessels. Then what will you face? You will face one of two things. The Government of the United States will have to run its $50,000,000 worth of ships at a loss, which is the same thing as a subsidy, or some discriminations will have to be made in favor of American ships, in order that the American flag may be kept on the seas.

Fifty million dollars' worth of ships is no great addition to the American merchant marine. Vessels to that amount certainly are needed in our coastwise trade to-day. Fifty million dollars' worth of ships added to the coastwise trade would not destroy it, but would bring about a healthy condition of competition. That is the only effect that would be produced, and if the ships, whether they are bought or whether they are built, are admitted to the coastwise trade when the war is over, they can be run without loss to the American Government, and there will be American citizens who will be ready and willing to buy them, because if proper ships are built or bought in trade they can be used where no other ships can compete with them except American ships, in a commerce which needs them, for no man can deny that they are needed and will be needed in the intercoastal trade; they are needed on the Pacific coast to-day, and they are needed on the Gulf coast. It is a plain business proposition that if we are going to pay $50,000,000 for ships, we ought to provide that there shall be a place where they can be used, and used profitably, after the European war is over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am interested in the Senator's discussion of this subject and welcome him to the ranks of those of us who believe that the Government ought to do something for American shipping.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have always believed that.

Mr. GALLINGER. But I had supposed that this bill was primarily intended to provide ships for the foreign commerce of the United States. Now, the Senator seems to argue that the purpose of this bill is to buy and construct ships for the coastwise trade.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. GALLINGER. That has been well obscured up to the present time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all——

Mr. GALLINGER. But the Senator is very frank in his statement that that is the purpose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all. I think the purpose of this bill is to acquire ships to build up the foreign trade of the country and also the coastwise trade. The terms of the bill apply to both. What I say is, that under existing law, when we return to normal conditions after the war, we can not maintain under the American flag the ships which are to be bought or built except at a loss, unless they are admitted to the coastwise trade, and then we will not have to suffer any loss, but we will get our money back.

I am hopeful that other legislation will be enacted that will discriminate in favor of American shipping and that will keep American ships on the seas in foreign commerce, as well as in the coastwise commerce; but I say that the provision looking to the admission of the ships to be acquired to the coastwise trade can not be objected to by anybody, unless it be by a man who wants to maintain a monopoly in favor of the ships that are already in the coastwise trade.

So far as the bill itself is concerned, I think it has been very much improved. It has been made a great deal more satisfactory to me than it was originally. One of the improvements in the bill is that the money provided can not be used to buy ships that are already engaged and are being used in American commerce. We want to keep them there. Another provision is that no ships can be bought belonging to belligerent Governments; consequently there will be no question of involving our country in foreign complications under the bill. But, in my judgment, the best provision in the new bill, as it has been amended, is the one which requires that the ships bought with the money provided by this bill must be 75 per cent as efficient and seaworthy as at the time they were originally put in commission.

If they are not 75 per cent as efficient and seaworthy as when they were originally built, they can not be bought. The result will probably be that under the terms of the bill we will be unable to buy any ships at all, because I think most of the ships that could be bought are not 75 per cent as efficient as when originally constructed. I do not believe that there are any ships for sale to-day that are 75 per cent as efficient as when originally put into operation. Those that are 75 per cent as efficient are all comparatively new ships; they were built for commerce and are engaged in commerce that is paying them well, and unless the Government of the United States should pay enormous prices for them it could not acquire them.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. If I heard the Senator correctly, it would seem that the best and most attractive quality of the bill is that it amounts to nothing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I did not say that. I think there are some very good things in this bill. I was simply pointing out the fact that under the terms of this bill there are no ships which sail the seas to-day which I think can be bought with the money proposed to be provided, and what will be the result?

Mr. WARREN. There will be no immediate relief, then.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The result will be that we will spend $50,000,000 to build ships—for what purpose? Ships that can be used as auxiliaries to our Navy, as transports for our Army, and which can be sold or leased to American citizens who will fly the American flag over them.

Mr. WARREN. Where does the Senator think they will be built?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, well, Rome was not built in a day. I am not contending that we are going to accomplish this result to-morrow.

Mr. WARREN. Does not the Senator believe that every shipyard now has orders beyond the entertainment of any further orders for at least a couple of years, or possibly more?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, probably; but I am sure that the Senator from Wyoming does not expect us to build up a merchant marine in an hour or a day. If we can build $50,000,000 worth of ships in American shipyards when the time comes, and we can make the contracts for those ships, will not that stimulate the building of ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, Mr. President; but——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just one moment. And if those ships are so built that they will be available for transports and for auxiliaries to the American Navy, does not that strengthen the arm of the Government in the event of war? Furthermore, if they can be used in the coastwise trade, does the Senator say that they can not be used profitably and sold for what it cost the Government to build them?

Mr. GALLINGER. But, Mr. President, the Senator is drawing on his imagination when he says they are going to be built in American shipyards. The shipyards of Japan, of Italy, of Germany, and of France, when the war closes, will be the ones which will in all probability build the ships; and certainly the yards of Japan and of Italy at the present time are in a position to do so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the facts and the statistics show conclusively that we can build pattern ships in American shipyards just as cheaply as they can be built in English shipyards.

Mr. GALLINGER. We can do that during the continuance of the European war, but the Senator does not believe we can do it after the war is over, does he?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We could do it before when we built pattern ships. The trouble with the American merchant marine, in connection with building ships in American shipyards, is that nearly everybody wants to build a different class of ship. In England they build pattern ships, which can be constructed cheaper than individual ships, and when we provide for $50,000,000 worth of ships to be built for the Government we can order patterns ships and have them built as cheaply as the English pattern ships are built.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very possibly that is so if the Government can have them built in one or two or three American shipyards, but the shipyards of all the world will be open to compete for the construction of the proposed new vessels.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Suppose we can not find shipyards owned by private individuals in the United States that desire to build these ships, we have still the navy yards, which have demonstrated their capacity to build good battleships, in which to build merchant ships, if the administration wants to utilize them. We built the Connecticut in a Government navy yard, and we can build pattern vessels in a navy yard and employ them in commerce.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the battleships built in Government navy yards are expensive luxuries.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all. I think a fair investigation of the building of the Connecticut itself, when allowance is made for the time of the men that was spent on repairs and charged to the building of the Connecticut, and of the building of her sister ship will disclose that we built the Connecticut in a Government navy yard practically as cheaply as the sister ship of the Connecticut, the name of which I have forgotten for the moment, was built in a private yard.

But the vital thing in this bill is to keep the Government from making a bad investment of its $50,000,000; and to enable it to make a good investment of the $50,000,000, so long as we have no laws on the statute books for the maintenance of our merchant marine on the high seas in foreign commerce, it is necessary to enable the ships to be built to engage in the only commerce that an American ship can engage in profitably, and that is in the coastwise trade. If we allow the ships to be constructed under the terms of this bill to engage in the coastwise trade, no matter what the conditions may be after the war, no matter what other laws may be passed for the benefit of American shipping, this $50,000,000 worth of ships will have a field in which they can operate, in which they can run, and not lose money. I am not in favor of the Government going into the enterprise of building $50,000,000 worth of ships merely to lose money.

The coastwise trade will not be destroyed if the ships to be provided under this bill are allowed to enter that trade.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] two years ago wanted us to put some of the transports and lighter battleships or cruisers in the shipping trade. If we are going to build these ships for transports to serve the Navy, why should not the man who buys them, when he is carrying a ship to serve his country in time of war, have the privilege of the coastwise trade that you grant to a man who has his money invested in it and who has not made any contract to serve his country in time of war? Why do you want to discriminate against the man who buys this ship that is built for an auxiliary to the Navy, and say to him: "If you buy this ship you must go to foreign seas and compete in foreign markets with foreign shipping," and yet say to the capitalist who puts his money in a ship, and does not contract to turn it over to the Government in time of war, that he shall have the benefit of this exclusive market in which we can guarantee him a successful venture in the shipping business?

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. A moment ago the Senator made the very interesting statement that we could build our ships essentially as cheaply as they can be built in England. I hold before me the report of the Moseley Industrial Commission, which was sent from Great Britain to investigate labor conditions in the United States and compare them with those in England; and the testimony shows that the average wage in American shipyards is from 75 to 100 per cent higher than in England. How does the Senator mean to dispose of that difficulty in the construction of ships?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not familiar with the report the Senator has in his hand.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is an English report, is it not?

Mr. HARDING. An English report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am free to confess, from my general information, and not that report, that the wages in England are lower in many lines of industry—I mean, the actual wage paid to each man is less—than the wages paid to the men in many lines of industry in America. But it has been demonstrated time and time again on investigation that the efficiency of the American laborer was so much greater than the efficiency of the foreign laborer that his efficiency made up for the difference in the wage scale, and it is not necessary for me to point to particular facts in that connection. If the Senator will merely take the hearings before any of the tariff committees that have recently written tariff bills, he will find that statement sustained time and time again. But I have seen the statement, coming from reliable authority, that the reason why English ships are built cheaper than American ships is because they build pattern ships, and we do not build pattern ships, and I am satisfied that if the Senator will read the investigations of the shipping commission that we had a few years ago, he will find that statement sustained. We have advantages over the English shipbuilder and he has advantages over us, but in the end the cost of building the ship is as low in the American yard where you build a pattern ship as it is in the foreign yard, and I think that can be sustained.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator is correct in saying that the Merchant Marine Commission did make that suggestion. I happened to be a member of that commission. The Merchant Marine Commission pointed out the fact that Great Britain, building so many vessels, standardized them, while we, building so few, did not standardize them.

Now, I am quite willing to admit that if the 75 ships, more or less, that will be built under this law, if the Senator is correct in saying that none can be bought—and I think he is pretty nearly correct on that point—if they could be built in two or three American shipyards lying near together and could be standardized, if it was desirable to make them all of the same type, beyond question great economies could be gained in their construction. There is no doubt about it. But still I have no idea that they could be built as cheaply as they can in Great Britain, where, after the war, wages will be what they were before the war commenced, and there will be a great deal of idle labor there, beyond a question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I take it that if conditions are anywhere nearly equal, no matter what administration we have in this country, when the time comes to build these ships, they will be built in American shipyards. I say that will be done if conditions are nearly equal, and I think they can be made nearly equal. But the proposition for which I am contending is that if we do build the ships, we do not want the Government to continue to own them and run them. I know the Senator from New Hampshire does not want that, and neither do I. If you want to sell them to American citizens to run them and take the Government out of the business, you have to make it fairly profitable for the American citizen to run them; and therefore I say, Why try to amend this provision in the bill that gives to the American owner of these ships an assured market, a profitable place where he can run his ships?

Before I take my seat—I did not intend to discuss this bill at all—there is just one more thing I want to say. This $50,000,000 appropriation to buy ships is only a small portion of this bill. The bill seeks to organize a commission to build up American shipping and to foster American shipping. There is not a great commercial nation in the world, there is not a nation in the world to-day that has a great shipping interest, that has not a board or a committee or some organization whose duty it is to foster it and take care of it and build it up except ourselves; and under this bill we are taking a step toward establishing a system that all our foreign rivals have had for many years, establishing a shipping board.

There are things in the establishment of this shipping board that do not entirely meet with my approval. It is not broad enough, in some respects, to suit me, but it is a start. I may be wrong about it, and others may be right about it. It is, however, laying the foundation for building up a system under which we can probably build up an American merchant marine in the future. That is why I am for this bill. That is more important than the appropriation in it. I contend that if you appoint five men under this bill who are strong, forceful, capable, competent men, who understand the shipping business, who understand the transportation question, who understand the great questions of commerce that confront our country, when they can give their entire time and attention to this one problem, they will work out a solution of the problem that we in Congress have not the time, have not the ability, and have not the opportunity to work out ourselves. Therefore, I say this bill should be passed.

Of course, the question as to whether or not the bill is going to serve the American people well is going to depend on the personnel of the board. I have confidence that the President of the United States will appoint men who will be capable of filling those positions adequately, and worthy of serving their country in that respect.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I join with the Senator in the hope that if this bill passes the President of the United States will appoint the very best men that are available for that purpose; and I want to say to the Senate that if a bill were before the Senate to-day creating a shipping board such as is provided for in that bill, and it were not connected with so many objectionable features, I think it would receive pretty nearly a unanimous vote on this side of the Chamber. I agree with the Senator, and I think the Republican Senators generally agree with the Senator, that the provision for a shipping board is a very wise one.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am glad to hear the Senator say that. I am glad also to hear the Senator admit that there is not very much difference between him and me, because, as I understand, he is not seriously opposed to building ships as auxiliaries to the American Navy in American shipyards; and he admits, as I concede, that in all probability there is going to be no possibility under this bill of buying any ships, and we must build them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator in the suggestion he has just made. It has been my privilege to introduce four or five bills which were designed, from my viewpoint, to rehabilitate the American merchant marine. In every one of those bills it was provided that the ships should be constructed upon plans and specifications furnished by the Navy Department, and that they should be constructed under the supervision of a representative of the Navy Department, and that they should be at the command of the Government in time of need. I assume, however, that even if that be not true as regards the present coastwise shipping, they could be commandeered in time of war and put into the service.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the Senator about that. I think that any ship which flies the American flag could be commandeered in time of war; but the difference is that we would have to pay a war price at that time. If they are built in this way, we get the benefit of a peace price when we sell them to the other man and make a contract with him. In the second place, if you commandeer any ship you may get a ship that is not fit for the service. If it is built as under the terms of this bill it must be built, it will be built for the purpose of serving the Government in time of war.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the provisions of the bill are not very well expressed on that point. I think the ships ought to be built, as was provided in other bills, upon plans and specifications of the Navy Department, and under the direction and supervision of the Navy Department. I think that is not in this bill, as I recall it now.

I approve of the shipping board provision. But, as I said a moment ago, there are other provisions in the bill that are very repugnant to my idea of building up an American merchant marine, and which I think will do more harm than good. That is the only difference between the Senator and myself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I said in the beginning, I say now that I think if we keep in this bill the provision that these ships may be used in the coastwise trade we will not lose any money by it. They will serve the Government in time of war, and they will serve the American people in time of peace. But if we want to be able to sell the ships to American citizens we will have to keep in the bill the provision that will give them an opportunity to use the ships on the seas where they can profitably use them.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I was interested in the Senator's discussion of the differential-duty proposition that is in the tariff bill that bears the Senator's honored name. I am of opinion that in view of changed conditions, and the fact that so many more articles are on the free list than were on the free list in the days of the fathers, when this scheme operated so successfully, it would not work as well as it did then, and I fear it would not work to the satisfaction of the Senator or of the Government. But as covering that point I have introduced in this Congress a bill granting a 10 per cent differential duty. I have also introduced one increasing the subventions to ships under the mail act of 1891. But those bills are slumbering somewhere, and I feel sure we shall not hear from them at this session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am thoroughly in favor of building up an American merchant marine, and I am in accord with the views of the Senator from New Hampshire that if we want an American merchant marine for the over-seas trade we shall have to discriminate in favor of that merchant marine or we can not keep it on the seas.

Mr. GALLINGER. We shall have to discriminate in some way.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I want to refer briefly to the remarks that have just been made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. He has partially given away the whole case which has been used in advocacy of this measure by saying that just as soon as the war is over, if these ships must be operated in the foreign trade, they are going to be a losing venture. Of course, everybody knows that is the case; but the trouble with the position taken by the Senator from Alabama is that he does not give consideration to the original cost of this enterprise.

There is ample testimony to show that it costs $2 to build a unit of shipping to-day where in normal times that unit of shipping could be built for $1. Therefore, if we build these ships, either in foreign shipyards or at home, they are going to cost twice the normal price for ships of their class. If we buy the ships, we will have to pay substantially twice the normal price for such ships.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does not the Senator believe that it will be impossible for us to have them built inside of two years?

Mr. WEEKS. Why, of course it will be impossible to have them built inside of two years.

Mr. HARDWICK. Therefore things may be normal by that time.

Mr. WEEKS. The contracts will be let, however, to be built when the yards can build them. But that any American yard can build these ships within two years is, of course, impossible, because there is more than a million tons of shipping contracted for in American yards to-day, and it will take substantially two years to construct that tonnage.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me just once more—because I am very much interested in that point——

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Why are we obliged to let the contracts right away? Why can we not wait two years, until we can get these ships built, and then hope we may have them built at a normal price?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, Mr. President, this is an emergency measure.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, well——

Mr. WEEKS. This bill was attempted originally as an emergency measure to provide against the high rates that American shippers were having to pay for the transportation of their goods. We have lost track of all that proposition in this bill. Undoubtedly it was intended originally to buy certain interned ships; and we have been drifting far afield until now in the Senate we have taken up this proposition which the Senator from Alabama has been discussing and which was not even in the House bill which came over here within a month, admitting these ships to the coastwise trade.

The Senator from Alabama criticizes this side because we did not take an opportunity which we had to protect American shipping in the repeal of the Panama Canal tolls act. As I remember, the Senator himself, as a Member of the House, voted against his party on that proposition; but it was passed by an overwhelming vote in the House at the dictation of the President.

Conditions in the House, however, were not different from those in the Senate, for of those who voted "yea" on this proposition, the prevailing side, 37 were Democrats and 13 Republicans. Of those who voted "nay," 10 were Democrats and 25 Republicans. In other words, the Republicans voted 2 to 1 against the repeal, while the Democrats voted nearly 4 to 1 in favor of it. To charge this side with being responsible for that legislation under those circumstances seems to me to be without reason.

The Senator from Alabama says that what we want to do on this side is to protect certain individuals who are engaged in the coastwise trade. What we really want to protect is the American people, or the interests of the American people engaged in the coastwise trade; and in doing so we want to do just what every nation in the world has done since nations were organized. For the first 30 years of the existence of this Government—until 1817—we maintained a monopoly of the coastwise trade by discriminating duties. Ninety-nine years ago we adopted the policy that obtains to-day, and we did it at the instance of many of those fathers of the Democratic Party of whom the Senator from Alabama is such a follower. No Democrat of those days was in favor of any other course, and no nation has adopted any other course even down to to-day. Under the policy which we adopted at that time we have built up in this country a tonnage of coastwise shipping greater than the total shipping of Germany engaged in the foreign trade and in the coastwise trade—greater by a million tons.

The Senator says it is a monopoly. It is a monopoly to American citizens, but every American citizen may enter into it under the conditions which prevail; and if there is a part of the coast of this country which has not been properly served, it is because the rates which could be obtained from that service were not or would not be remunerative. If the people of the Gulf States were not properly served, why did they not build or buy ships to go into that service and take care of their own trade, if it were profitable to do that business? The probabilities are that it was not profitable; and the truth is that this coastwise service has been so competitive in the past that it has not been an overpopular occupation. It has not been a very remunerative business. If we refer to those companies which are most criticized and examine their financial records for the last 10 or 15 years, it will be shown that it has not been a profitable business on the whole. The stocks of any of these companies could have been purchased, before the beginning of the present war, for about 75 per cent of the replacement value of the properties which those stocks covered. What we want to do is to protect this business for the American people—not protect it for the benefit of any particular individuals or any particular companies.

I want to correct once more—it has been done many times—an impression that seems to prevail that there is a monopoly other than a national one. It was stated, in what is known as the Alexander report, that a monopoly of a certain class of the coastwise business was controlled by some 30 steamship companies. But those 30 steamship companies only controlled about 850,000 tons of shipping, while there are six and a half million tons of shipping in our coastwise trade. Therefore, those 30 steamship lines only controlled about 12 per cent of the total amount of our coastwise shipping, and not over 18 per cent of the steamers engaged in our coastwise trade. They were the regular lines, but the vast volume of the business is done, not by regular lines but by tramp steamers.

This proposition has been put into this bill by an amendment offered by the Senate committee. A similar proposition was presented when this bill was under consideration a year ago last winter, and it was voted down. And this vote came to a considerable extent from Senators on that side of the Chamber. I want to call to the attention of the Senate the names of those Senators who voted against the proposition then presented in almost exactly the same form it appears now in the bill proposed by the committee.

The vote was 33 in favor of the amendment, which was offered by the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and 54 against it. The Democratic Senators who voted against it were the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who proposes and is now defending this proposition; the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. WHITE]. What I am going to be curious to see when this vote is taken is the action which these Senators who voted against this proposition a year ago next winter will take and how they will justify their action if they do not vote the same way to-day.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, I desire to correct his statement that this is the same proposition now that was voted on then. On the contrary, the proposition then was to admit all foreign-built ships to the coastwise trade. The amendment of the Senate committee admits only the vessels owned by the United States to the coastwise trade. It is a very different proposition, indeed.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; but, Mr. President, this amendment proposes to admit ships that are purchased under the provisions of this act or built under the provisions of this act, wherever built; and naturally and almost necessarily they will be built in foreign yards, or purchased from foreign owners, the ships having been built in foreign yards.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. But it admits only the foreign-built ships that are brought into the registry by the Government of the United States, either by purchase or by construction.

Mr. WEEKS. Very true; but, Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. It goes further than that. It also admits any vessel owned, chartered, or leased by any corporation in which the United States is a stockholder. If any of these corporations leases a vessel or charters a vessel that is foreign built, it may go into the coastwise trade.

Mr. WEEKS. The principle is the same. We are opening the door to the admission of foreign-built ships into our coastwise trade. We are taking a step which has never been taken by any nation in the world up to this time. It is a natural thing for a people to control their own coastwise business. I think it is the most ill-advised step that can be taken in connection with all of our shipping interests.

I am in favor of the establishment of a shipping board, not with the powers given this board, which are restricted and coercive and which will not, in my judgment, enlarge the merchant marine, but a shipping board with suitable powers. I am in favor of building auxiliaries for the Navy at the proper time and under the proper conditions; and if we build a sufficient number for the Navy we are sure to have more than we can use in ordinary peace times; under those conditions surplus ships could be leased or chartered to private individuals, to be used in commercial pursuits. That was the general purport of the bill to which the Senator from Alabama referred, which I introduced.

If the pending bill were limited to those two provisions, I should be glad to vote for it. But the other provisions of the bill are so restrictive that they will prevent what the sponsors for the bill hope may result from it; that is, something in the way of the development of an American merchant marine.

Taking everything into consideration, I do not think we could do anything which would be more certain than the passage of this bill to reduce the volume of our merchant marine and almost certain to put our shipyards partially, if not entirely, out of commission. That this is not a Democratic policy as the fathers knew it I want to demonstrate by reading from Thomas Jefferson what he said about building our own ships. Mr. Jefferson said, in 1794—

To force shipbuilding is to establish shipyards; is to form magazines; to multiply useful hands; to produce artists and workmen of every kind who may be found at once for the peaceful speculations of commerce and for the terrible wants of war. * * * For a navigating people to purchase its marine afloat would be a strange speculation, as the marine would always be dependent on the merchants furnishing them. Placing, as a reserve, with a foreign nation or in a foreign shipyard the carpenters, blacksmiths, calkers, sailmakers, and the vessels of a nation would be a singular commercial combination. We must, therefore, build them for ourselves.

And yet, under the provisions of this bill and almost certainly after the war is over, any ships that are purchased or built are going to be built in foreign shipyards or are going to be foreign ships purchased.

It is for all these reasons, which seem to me to be sufficient, that I oppose this legislation, and particularly oppose the amendment which has been offered by the committee, which will admit to the coastwise trade foreign-built ships.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee on page—— .

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I think the question is on the substitute which I offered to section 9.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Ohio is to strike out and insert. Under the rules of the Senate the part to be stricken out has a right to be first amended. Under that rule the amendments offered by the committee to the section are first in order. The question is on the amendment on page 7, at the end of line 16, after the word "licensed," to insert "or both registered and enrolled and licensed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, page 7, line 19, after the word "vessels," to strike out "heretofore or hereafter"; in line 21, after the word "under," to strike out "the act of August 18, 1914, or under"; in line 24, after the word "stockholder," to strike out "(except the Panama Railroad Co.)" and insert "and vessels sold, leased, or chartered to any person a citizen of the United States, as provided in this act," so as to read:

Provided, That foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry or enrollment and license under this act, and vessels owned, chartered, or leased by any corporation in which the United States is a stockholder, and vessels sold, leased, or chartered to any person a citizen of the United States, as provided in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, on page 8, line 2, after the word "may," to strike out "not," so as to read:

Provided, That foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry or enrollment and license under this act, and vessels owned, chartered, or leased by any corporation in which the United States is a stockholder, and vessels sold, leased, or chartered to any person a citizen of the United States, as provided in this act, may engage in the coastwise trade of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that is the crux of the whole situation. The House, the Democratic House, in its wisdom, provided that these vessels should not engage in the coastwise trade of the United States, but the Senate committee has stricken out the word "not," and leaves the bill to read that they may engage in the coastwise trade of the United States.

I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and withhold my vote.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], which I transfer to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Repeating the transfer I announced on the former vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. I do not know how he would vote on this question. I will therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMPSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). I have already announced the reason of the absence of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I simply wish to state that if he were present he would vote "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. I announced my general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], but I understand that on this question he is paired with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has not voted. I am paired with that Senator, but I will transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], and let my vote stand.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to repeat the announcement made once before, that my colleague [Mr. LODGE] has a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. My colleague would vote "nay," if present.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am paired with the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, page 8, line 3, after the words "United States," to strike out:

Except that such vessels may engage in trade with Alaska, Hawaii, or Porto Rico, whether or not en route to or from a foreign port, if the board finds such trade is not being adequately served by a regular line or lines of vessels.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 25, after the word "flag," to insert: "No vessel registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States, or owned by any person a citizen of the United States, except one which the board is prohibited from purchasing, shall be sold to any person not a citizen of the United States or transferred to a foreign registry or flag, unless such vessel is first tendered to the board at the price in good faith offered by others, or, if no such offer, at a fair price to be determined in the manner provided in section 10," so as to make the clause read:

When the United States is at war, or during any national emergency the existence of which is declared by proclamation of the President, no vessel registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States shall, without the approval of the board, be sold, leased, or chartered to any person not a citizen of the United States, or transferred to a foreign registry or flag. No vessel registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States, or owned by any person a citizen of the United States, except one which the board is prohibited from purchasing, shall be sold to any person not a citizen of the United States or transferred to a foreign registry or flag, unless such vessel is first tendered to the board at the price in good faith offered by others, or, if no such offer, at a fair price to be determined in the manner provided in section 10.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 9 as amended it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 9. That any vessel purchased, chartered, or leased from the board may be registered as a vessel of the United States and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining thereto: Provided, That foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry under this act, and foreign-built vessels owned, chartered, or leased by any corporation in which the United States is a stockholder and foreign-built vessels sold, leased, or chartered to any person a citizen of the United States, as provided in this act, may not engage in the coastwise trade of the United States.

Every vessel purchased, chartered, or leased from the board shall, unless otherwise authorized by the board, be operated only under such registry. Such vessels while employed solely as merchant vessels shall be subject to all laws, regulations, and liabilities governing merchant vessels, whether the United States be interested therein as owner, in whole or in part, or hold any mortgage, lien, or other interest therein. No such vessel, without the approval of the board, shall be transferred to a foreign registry or flag, or sold; nor, except under regulations prescribed by the board, be chartered or leased.

When the United States is at war, or during any national emergency the existence of which is declared by proclamation of the President, no vessel registered under the laws of the United States shall, without the approval of the board, be sold, leased, or chartered to any person not a citizen of the United States, or transferred to a foreign registry or flag. No vessel registered under the laws of the United States, or owned by any person a citizen of the United States, except one which the board is prohibited from purchasing, shall be sold to any person not a citizen of the United States or transferred to a foreign registry or flag, unless such vessel is first tendered to the board at the price in good faith offered by others, or, if no such offer, at a fair price to be determined in the manner provided in section 10.

Any vessel sold, chartered, leased, transferred, or operated in violation of this section shall be forfeited to the United States, and whoever violates any provision of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of not more than $5,000 or to imprisonment of not more than five years, or both such fine and imprisonment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, in section 10, page 10, line 1, after the word "value," to insert "based upon normal conditions"; in line 4, after the word "value," to insert "under normal conditions"; in line 5, after the word "to," to strike out "the" and insert "such"; and in line 8, after the words "finding of," to strike out "a majority of," so as to make the clause read:

Thereafter, upon ascertainment by agreement or otherwise, the United States shall pay the person interested the fair actual value based upon normal conditions at the time of taking of the interest of such person in every vessel taken absolutely, or if taken for a limited period, the fair charter value under normal conditions for such period. In case of disagreement as to such fair value it shall be determined by appraisers, one to be appointed by the board, one by the person interested, and a third by the two so appointed. The finding of such appraisers shall be final and binding upon both parties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 11, page 10, line 24, after the word "therein," to insert: "Provided, That no corporation in which the United States is a stockholder, formed under the authority of this section, shall engage in the operation of any vessel constructed, purchased, leased, chartered, or transferred under the authority of this act unless the board shall be unable, after a bona fide effort, to contract with any person a citizen of the United States for the purchase, lease, or charter of such vessel under such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the board.

"The board shall give public notice of the fact that vessels are offered and the terms and conditions upon which a contract will be made, and may invite competitive offerings. In the event the board shall, after full compliance with the terms of this proviso, determine that it is unable to enter into a contract with such private parties for the purchase, lease, or charter of such vessel, it shall make a full report to the President, who shall examine such report, and if he shall approve the same he shall make an order declaring that the conditions have been found to exist which justify the operation of such vessel by a corporation formed under the provisions of this section," so as to read:

That the board, if in its judgment such action is necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, may form under the laws of the District of Columbia one or more corporations for the purchase, construction, equipment, lease, charter, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels in the commerce of the United States. The total capital stock thereof shall not exceed $50,000,000. The board may, for and on behalf of the United States, subscribe to, purchase, and vote not less than a majority of the capital stock of any such corporation, and do all other things in regard thereto necessary to protect the interests of the United States and to carry out the purposes of this act. The board, with the approval of the President, may sell any or all of the stock of the United States in such corporation, but at no time shall it be a minority stockholder therein: Provided, That no corporation in which the United States is a stockholder, formed under the authority of this section, shall engage, etc.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not intend to discuss the amendment proposed by the committee, but if adopted, and I assume it will be, I do not want the section so adopted as to preclude a motion to strike the entire section from the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move an amendment to which I think there will be no objection. In line 10, page 11, I move to substitute the word "shall" for the word "may."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, in the committee amendment, line 10, before the word "invite," strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall," so as to read, "and shall invite competitive offerings."

Mr. FLETCHER. I accept that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, after line 11, to strike out:

SEC. 12. That any vessel purchased, leased, or chartered from the board may be listed by the Secretary of the Navy as a vessel of the United States Naval Auxiliary Reserve. The officers and members of the crew of any such listed vessel who volunteer for the purpose and are citizens of the United States or its insular possessions may, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, be enrolled in various ranks and ratings corresponding to those of the United States Navy, not above the rank of lieutenant commander, as members of any naval reserve force established by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 14, page 13, line 21, after the word "no," to strike out "expenditure shall be made nor," and in line 22, after the word "liability," to insert "shall be," so as to make the clause read:

That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of sections 5 and 11 no liability shall be incurred exceeding a total of $50,000,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the request of the board, approved by the President, shall from time to time issue and sell or use any of the bonds of the United States now available in the Treasury under the acts of August 5, 1909, February 4, 1910, and March 2, 1911, relating to the issue of bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal, to a total amount not to exceed $50,000,000: Provided, That any bonds issued and sold or used under the provisions of this section may be made payable at such time within 50 years after issue as the Secretary of the Treasury may fix, instead of 50 years after the date of issue, as prescribed in the act of August 5, 1909.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 15, page 15, line 2, after the words "beyond the," to strike out "period for which computed," and insert "completion of the service for which it is paid," so as to read:

SEC. 15. That no common carrier by water shall directly or indirectly—

First. Pay or allow, or enter into any combination, agreement, or understanding, express or implied, to pay or allow, a deferred rebate to any shipper. The term "deferred rebate" in this act means a return of any portion of the freight money by a carrier to any shipper as a consideration for the giving of all or any portion of his shipments to the same or any other carrier, or for any other purpose, the payment of which is deferred beyond the completion of the service for which it is paid, and is made only if, during both the period for which computed and the period of deferment, the shipper has complied with the terms of the rebate agreement or arrangement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes the committee amendments as printed in the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to offer some amendments on behalf of the committee, if the Senator from Iowa will permit me.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

Mr. FLETCHER. On page 28, in lines 7 and 8—which is the statute of limitations in this proposed statute—the language is:

In a district or State court unless filed within one year from the date of the order.

It seems to me it would be advisable to strike out the words "in a district or State court," because with those words included there might be a question about the jurisdiction of territorial courts. There is not any need to specify the particular court in which a petition or suit may be filed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 30, page 28, line 7, after the word "maintained," it is proposed to strike out the words "in a district or State court."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. On page 22, in line 9, after the word "court," I move to strike out the words "of a State or of the United States."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in as section 27 of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section to be known as section 27, as follows:

SEC. 27. The board shall have power, and it shall be its duty whenever complaint shall be made to it, to investigate the action of any foreign Government with respect to the privileges afforded and burdens imposed upon vessels of the United States engaged in foreign trade whenever it shall appear that the laws, regulations, or practices of any foreign Government operate in such a manner that vessels of the United States are not accorded equal privileges in foreign trade with vessels of such foreign countries or vessels of other foreign countries, either in trade to or from the ports of such foreign country or in respect of the passage or transportation through such foreign country of passengers or goods intended for shipment or transportation in such vessels of the United States, either to or from ports of such foreign country or to or from ports of other foreign countries. It shall be the duty of the board to report the results of its investigation to the President with its recommendations and the President is hereby authorized and empowered to secure by diplomatic action equal privileges for vessels of the United States engaged in such foreign trade. And if by such diplomatic action the President shall be unable to secure such equal privileges then the President shall advise Congress as to the facts and his conclusions by special message, if deemed important in the public interest, in order that proper action may be taken thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is agreed to, without objection.

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment just adopted should come in following section 26, as it now appears in the bill. I ask that the Secretary be allowed to renumber the sections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, to come at the end of line 9, on page 1 of the bill. I move to strike out the period, to insert a colon, and to add the words which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 1, line 9, after the word "trade," it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That a cargo boat, commonly called an ocean tramp, shall not be deemed such common carrier by water in foreign commerce.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I do not see any objection to that amendment. It may go in the bill to go to conference, and if there is any objection to it it will develop there.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and I call the attention of the Senator from Florida to it, as it is the amendment which I explained to him with reference to marine insurance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 13, page 13, line 3, after the word "registry," it is proposed to insert:

It shall examine the rules under which vessels are constructed abroad and in the United States, and the methods of classifying and rating same, and it shall examine into the subject of marine insurance, the number of companies in the United States, domestic and foreign, engaging in marine insurance, the extent of the insurance on hulls and cargoes placed or written in the United States, and the extent of reinsurance of American maritime risks in foreign companies, and ascertain what steps may be necessary to develop an ample marine-insurance system as an aid in the development of an American merchant marine.

Mr. FLETCHER. So far as I can see, there is no objection to that amendment. I think it has some good provisions in it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is agreed to, without objection.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I beg to offer the amendment which I presented a few days ago, and I now ask that it be read by the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, at the proper place in the bill, the following:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to refuse a clearance to any vessel or other vehicle laden with merchandise destined for a foreign or domestic port whenever he shall have satisfactory reason to believe that the master, owner, or other officer of such vessel or other vehicle refuses or declines to accept or receive freight or cargo tendered for such port of destination or for some intermediate port of call, together with the proper freight or transportation charges therefor, by any citizen of the United States, unless the same is so declined or refused because such vessel or other vehicle is fully laden and has no space accommodations for the freight or cargo so tendered, due regard being had for the proper loading of such vessel or vehicle.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Colorado a question: Supposing the cargo is declined on the ground that it is not in proper condition—that it is a dangerous cargo; what then?

Mr. THOMAS. I think the amendment provides for that; it provides that it shall be a proper cargo.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thought the only condition was in the event there was not room for it.

Mr. THOMAS. I think not. If that is the case, however, it ought to be remedied so as to meet that objection, because the Senator's suggestion is a good one. I think, however, that is provided for.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well. If it is, I have no criticism to make of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is agreed to, without objection.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to offer three amendments to the bill. I think it is only fair to say now that on two of them, at least, I shall ask for the yeas and nays, and that possibly I shall ask for the yeas and nays on all of them.

I move to strike out section 11, and also the words "and eleven," in line 21, page 13, and the same words in line 17, page 14. I think possibly the Senate will permit these amendments to be considered as one, for they all tend toward a single object.

Section 11 is one which authorizes the shipping board to organize a private corporation under the laws of the District of Columbia, and authorizes that corporation, which may solicit private subscriptions to its capital stock, to purchase, charter, lease, sell, recharter, and release these ships. I discussed the matter the other day as fully as I care to discuss it. I am not for any part of the bill—I want no misunderstanding about that. I think it is fundamentally wrong; but as to this section, there is nothing but mischief in it. It can accomplish no good, and there is in it the opportunity for a great deal of wrong and evil. Upon the motion I have made, Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Will the Chair state the question, please?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to strike out section 11 as amended, and also to strike out the words "and eleven," in two other places referring to section 11 and depending upon section 11. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECKHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BRYAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], and vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I transfer the general pair I have with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). If the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] were present, he would vote "yea" on this motion.

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "yea." I should like the announcement I have made to stand for the remainder of the day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WEEKS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. LODGE], if he were present, would vote "yea" on this motion.

Mr. LIPPITT. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. Not being able to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BECKHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 39, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. CUMMINS was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I move to strike from section 16 as follows: Beginning in line 18 on page 17 down to and including line 3 on page 18.

A single word of explanation. This is the part of the bill which repeals the antitrust law. On it I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to announce that if my colleague [Mr. LODGE] were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I move to amend section 15, line 18, page 14, by inserting after the word "water" the words "in interstate commerce"; to insert the same words after the word "water" in section 16, line 6, page 16; to insert the same words after the word "water" in section 17, line 8, page 18; and to insert the same words after the word "water" in section 21, line 15, page 21.

These amendments are all for the purpose of doing a single thing. If adopted, the foreign commerce of the United States would not be hampered by the regulations which are provided for in the bill. As I pointed out the other day, we can not regulate foreign ships; and it is in the last degree unwise, in my opinion, to attempt to lay upon our own ships a burden which we can not compel their competitors to bear. The result would be to diminish the American merchant marine rather than to increase it.

I do not intend myself to ask for the yeas and nays upon this amendment, because the matter has been discussed, and, in some phases of it, has been already voted upon. Of course, some other Senator may do so if he desires. I think there could not be anything done in the way of legislation that would have a greater tendency to embarrass, if not to destroy, American ships engaged in foreign commerce than the passage of the bill as it is now proposed. These amendments would simply exclude our own ships engaged in foreign commerce only from the regulatory provisions of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the amendments now submitted by the Senator from Iowa I wish to ask the Senator a specific question concerning the amendment that was just voted down. In the opinion of the Senator from Iowa, does the language that he moved to strike from the bill repeal to that extent the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. CUMMINS. Unquestionably, with respect to every combination, agreement, or understanding that is made lawful under this bill. The Senator from New Hampshire will remember that this bill provides that all this shipping must report to the shipping board concerning every agreement or understanding or conference had with respect to concerted action in the shipping business, and must report a great many other things. Until the shipping board declares these agreements unlawful, the bill expressly makes them lawful. The part which I sought to strike out provides that all these agreements and understandings and conferences, no matter what they may be, which are made lawful under the bill under consideration shall be excepted from the operation of the antitrust law, and as to all such matters the antitrust law is repealed by this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, while it probably is a fact that the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law have sometimes been evaded, can the Senator from Iowa cite another instance where the Congress of the United States has actually agreed to a proposition which nullifies that statute to a certain extent?

Mr. CUMMINS. As I said the other day, I have never known the attempt to be made, even. I have heard of some people on the outside—the railway companies and other great corporations—who were venturesome enough to suggest that the antitrust law ought to be modified or repealed, but until this measure made its appearance I had never heard the suggestion made in Congress. It will be remembered that the antitrust law simply says that there shall be no agreement or combination in restraint of trade.

Now, we are abandoning that test and saying that in the shipping business there may be agreements and understandings and conferences which have the effect of agreements in restraint of trade. That is our declaration in passing this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa has suggested that he would not ask for the yeas and nays on the amendments which he has just offered. I think the matter is a very important one, and I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendments proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECKHAM (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as in the former roll calls as to my pair, I vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I make the same announcement regarding my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as previously announced, I vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the last roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], if present, would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. STONE. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. REED. Making the same announcement as on the previous roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 40, as follows:

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendments were rejected.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, on page 8, line 18, after the word "leased," I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, after the word "leased," at the end of line 18, it is proposed to insert the following words:

No such vessel while employed solely as merchant vessels shall be required or permitted to transport for gain any alien immigrant to a port of the United States who can not read the English language or some other language or dialect, including Hebrew or Yiddish.

Any master of any such vessel carrying such an illiterate alien without charge or who violates this provision shall be subject to a fine of not less than $100 for each offense or imprisonment for not less than three months, or both.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. I make this announcement for the day. I vote "nay."

So Mr. BORAH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment I offered a few moments ago was agreed to, my purpose being to clarify it somewhat in a matter of detail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMAS. I send the amendment to the desk and ask that it be read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment heretofore offered insert as an independent section the following:

SEC. —. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to refuse a clearance to any vessel or other vehicle laden with merchandise destined for a foreign or domestic port whenever he shall have satisfactory reason to believe that the master, owner, or other officer of such vessel or other vehicle refuses or declines to accept or receive freight or cargo in good condition tendered for such port of destination or for some intermediate port of call, together with the proper freight or transportation charges therefor, by any citizen of the United States, unless the same is fully laden and has no space accommodations for the freight or cargo so tendered, due regard being had for the proper loading of such vessel or vehicle, or unless such freight or cargo consists of merchandise for which such vessel or vehicle is not adaptable.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, just one word. I wonder what reason a Senator can give for not voting for this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be agreed to without objection.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move to amend the bill on page 4, line 17, by striking out "$10,000" and inserting "$7,500."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 17, where it reads "That each member of the board shall receive a salary of $10,000 per annum," the Senator from Georgia proposes to strike out "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$7,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I read on page 5, line 3, these words:

With the exception of the secretary, a clerk to each commissioner, the attorneys, naval architects, and such special experts and examiners as the board may from time to time find necessary to employ for the conduct of its work, all employees of the board shall be a part of the classified civil service.

I will ask the Senator from Florida just what that language is meant to imply. I ask the Senator what is to be inferred from it?

Mr. FLETCHER. They are to be embraced within the classified service.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are not to be appointed from the classified service but to be legislated into the classified service, are they not?

Mr. FLETCHER. They are to be selected from the classified service.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not so say. I offer the following amendment. Before it is read I will say this matter of civil service is being debated pretty keenly at the present time and I do not believe any Senator on either side of the Chamber wants to put himself on record as having men appointed without examination and without certification, and saying that they shall be a part of the classified service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "a part of the classified civil service of the United States," and in lieu insert:

Appointed from lists of eligibles to be supplied by the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the civil-service law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think that is what was intended by the provisions of the bill; but the bill came over from the House with this language in it, and I would not like to change it offhand without understanding a little more clearly what the Senator is driving at.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am driving at placing these clerks and stenographers under the civil service and having them certified from the list which the Civil Service Commission now has; that is all.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, our friends on the other side have covered into the classified service without examination thousands of people who were not in the civil service before; but I will make no objection to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, at the end of the bill after section 35, I submit an amendment as a new section. I will say that the amendment which I propose is the immigration bill as reported from the committee. I have no desire to ask to have it read in full, but I am willing that that shall be waived. Upon the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, on which he asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECKHAM (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Making the same announcement as heretofore concerning my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON. I make the same announcement of my pair as on the former ballot and withhold my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when Mr. PAGE's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. PAGE] is necessarily absent from the city, and is paired. If present, he would vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. JONES (when Mr. POINDEXTER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is necessarily absent. I know that if he were present he would vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as heretofore and vote "nay."

Mr. SHAFROTH (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as heretofore and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement in regard to my pair and its transfer as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] as I did on the last call, I vote "nay."

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. SUTHERLAND's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and withhold my vote. If at liberty, I should vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). If the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] were present, he would vote "yea" on this amendment.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED. Making the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to announce that if my colleague [Mr. LODGE] were present he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 37, as follows:

So Mr. BORAH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. BORAH's amendment in full was to insert as a new section the following:

That the word "alien" wherever used in this act shall include any person not a native-born or naturalized citizen of the United States; but this definition shall not be held to include Indians of the United States not taxed or citizens of the islands under the jurisdiction of the United States. That the term "United States" as used in the title as well as in the various sections of this act shall be construed to mean the United States, and any waters, territory, or other place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, except the Isthmian Canal Zone; but if any alien shall leave the Canal Zone or any insular possession of the United States and attempt to enter any other place under the jurisdiction of the United States nothing contained in this act shall be construed as permitting him to enter under any other conditions than those applicable to all aliens. That the term "seaman" as used in this act shall include every person signed on the ship's articles and employed in any capacity on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place.

That this act shall be enforced in the Philippine Islands by officers of the general government thereof designated by appropriate legislation of said government.

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a tax of $8 for every alien, including alien seamen regularly admitted as provided in this act, entering the United States: Provided, That children under 16 years of age who accompany their father or their mother shall not be subject to said tax. The said tax shall be paid to the collector of customs of the port or customs district to which said alien shall come, or, if there be no collector at such port or district, then to the collector nearest thereto, by the master, agent, owner, or consignee of the vessel, transportation line, or other conveyance or vehicle bringing such alien to the United States, or by the alien himself if he does not come by a vessel, transportation line, or other conveyance or vehicle or when collection from the master, agent, owner, or consignee of the vessel, transportation line, or other conveyance, or vehicle bringing such alien to the United States is impracticable. The tax imposed by this section shall be a lien upon the vessel or other vehicle of carriage or transportation bringing such aliens to the United States, and shall be a debt in favor of the United States against the owner or owners of such vessel or other vehicle, and the payment of such tax may be enforced by any legal or equitable remedy. That the said tax shall not be levied on account of aliens who enter the United States after an uninterrupted residence of at least one year immediately preceding such entrance in the Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, the Republic of Cuba, or the Republic of Mexico, for a temporary stay, nor on account of otherwise admissible residents or citizens of any possession of the United States, nor on account of aliens in transit through the United States, nor upon aliens who have been lawfully admitted to the United States and who later shall go in transit from one part of the United States to another through foreign contiguous territory, and the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, shall issue rules and regulations and prescribe the conditions necessary to prevent abuse of these exceptions: Provided, That the Commissioner General of Immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, by agreement with transportation lines, as provided in section 23 of this act, may arrange in some other manner for the payment of the tax imposed by this section upon any or all aliens seeking admission from foreign contiguous territory: Provided further, That said tax, when levied upon aliens entering the Philippine Islands, shall be paid into the treasury of said islands, to be expended for the benefit of such islands: Provided further, That in the cases of aliens applying for admission from foreign contiguous territory and rejected, the head tax collected shall, upon application upon a blank which shall be furnished and explained to him, be refunded to the alien.

That the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission into the United States: All idiots, imbeciles, feeble-minded persons, epileptics, insane persons; persons who have had one or more attacks of insanity at any time previously; persons of constitutional psychopathic inferiority; persons with chronic alcoholism; paupers, professional beggars; vagrants; persons afflicted with tuberculosis in any form or with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease; persons not comprehended within any of the foregoing excluded classes who are found to be and are certified by the examining surgeon as being mentally or physically defective, such physical defect being of a nature which may affect the ability of such alien to earn a living; persons who have been convicted of or admit having committed a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude; polygamists, or persons who practice polygamy or believe in or advocate the practice of polygamy; anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or of all forms of law, or who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government, or who advocate the assassination of public officials, or who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property; persons who are members of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or who advocate or teach the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, or who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property; prostitutes, or persons coming into the United States for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; persons who directly or indirectly procure or attempt to procure or import prostitutes or persons for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; persons who are supported by or receive in whole or in part the proceeds of prostitution; persons hereinafter called contract laborers, who have been induced, assisted, encouraged, or solicited to migrate to this country by offers or promises of employment, whether such offers or promises are true or false, or in consequence of agreements, oral, written, or printed, express or implied, to perform labor in this country of any kind, skilled or unskilled; persons who have come in consequence of advertisements for laborers printed, published, or distributed in a foreign country; persons likely to become a public charge; persons who have been deported under any of the provisions of this act, and who may again seek admission within one year from the date of such deportation, unless prior to their reembarkation at a foreign port or their attempt to be admitted from foreign contiguous territory the Secretary of Labor shall have consented to their reapplying for admission; persons whose tickets or passage is paid for with the money of another, or who are assisted by others to come, unless it is affirmatively and satisfactorily shown that such persons do not belong to one of the foregoing excluded classes; persons whose ticket or passage is paid for by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign Government, either directly or indirectly; stowaways, except that any such stowaway, if otherwise admissible, may be admitted in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor; all children under 16 years of age, unaccompanied by or not coming to one or both of their parents, except that any such children may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, be admitted if in his opinion they are not likely to become a public charge and are otherwise eligible; persons who can not become eligible, under existing law, to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, unless otherwise provided for by existing agreements as to passports, or by existing treaties, conventions, or agreements, or by treaties, conventions, or agreements that may hereafter be entered into; Hindus. The two provisions next foregoing, however, shall not apply to persons of the following status or occupations: Government officers, ministers or religious teachers, missionaries, lawyers, physicians, chemists, civil engineers, teachers, students, authors, artists, merchants, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure, nor to their legal wives or their children under 16 years of age who shall accompany them or who subsequently may apply for admission to the United States, but such persons or their legal wives or foreign-born children who fail to maintain in the United States a status or occupation placing them within the excepted classes shall be deemed to be in the United States contrary to law, and shall be subject to deportation as provided in section 19 of this act.

That after three months from the passage of this act, in addition to the aliens who are by law now excluded from admission into the United States, the following persons shall also be excluded from admission thereto, to wit:

All aliens over 16 years of age, physically capable of reading, who can not read the English language, or some other language or dialect, including Hebrew or Yiddish: Provided, That any admissible alien, or any alien heretofore or hereafter legally admitted, or any citizen of the United States, may bring in or send for his father or grandfather over 55 years of age, his wife, his mother, his grandmother, or his unmarried or widowed daughter, if otherwise admissible, whether such relative can read or not; and such relative shall be permitted to enter. That for the purpose of ascertaining whether aliens can read the immigrant inspectors shall be furnished with slips of uniform size, prepared under the direction of the Secretary of Labor, each containing not less than 30 nor more than 40 words in ordinary use, printed in plainly legible type in some one of the various languages or dialects of immigrants. Each alien may designate the particular language or dialect in which he desires the examination to be made, and shall be required to read the words printed on the slip in such language or dialect. That the following classes of persons shall be exempt from the operation of the illiteracy test, to wit: All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Labor that they are seeking admission to the United States to avoid religious persecution in the country of their last permanent residence, whether such persecution be evidenced by overt acts or by laws or governmental regulations that discriminate against the alien or the race to which he belongs because of his religious faith; all aliens who have been lawfully admitted to the United States and who have resided therein continuously for five years, and who have in accordance with the law declared their intention of becoming citizens of the United States and who return to the United States within six months from the date of their departure therefrom; all aliens in transit through the United States; all aliens who have been lawfully admitted to the United States and who later shall go in transit from one part of the United States to another through foreign contiguous territory: Provided, That nothing in this act shall exclude, if otherwise admissible, persons convicted, or who admit the commission, or who teach or advocate the commission, of an offense purely political unless such offense is a felony: Provided further, That the provisions of this act, relating to the payments for tickets or passage by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign Government shall not apply to the tickets or passage of aliens in immediate and continuous transit through the United States to foreign contiguous territory: Provided further, That skilled labor, if otherwise admissible, may be imported if labor of like kind unemployed can not be found in this country, and the question of the necessity of importing such skilled labor in any particular instance may be determined by the Secretary of Labor upon the application of any person interested, such application to be made before such importation, and such determination by the Secretary of Labor to be reached after a full hearing and an investigation into the facts of the case: Provided further, That the provisions of this law applicable to contract labor shall not be held to exclude professional actors, artists, lecturers, singers, nurses, ministers of any religious denomination, professors for colleges or seminaries, persons belonging to any recognized learned profession, or persons employed as domestic servants: Provided further, That whenever the President shall be satisfied that passports issued by any foreign Government to its citizens or subjects to go to any country other than the United States, or to any insular possession of the United States or to the Canal Zone, are being used for the purpose of enabling the holder to come to the continental territory of the United States to the detriment of labor conditions therein, the President shall refuse to permit such citizens or subjects of the country issuing such passports to enter the continental territory of the United States from such other country or from such insular posssesion or from the Canal Zone: Provided further, That whenever any foreign country contiguous to the United States shall, by statute, executive order, or otherwise, exclude from its territory any class or classes of citizens of the United States upon grounds different from the grounds for excluding aliens from the United States herein specified, the same class or classes of aliens residing in such contiguous country shall be excluded from the United States so long as such exclusion of the United States citizens continues: Provided further, That aliens returning after a temporary absence to an unrelinquished United States domicile of seven consecutive years may be admitted in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, and under such conditions as he may prescribe: Provided further, That nothing in the contract-labor or reading-test provisions of this act shall be construed to prevent, hinder, or restrict any alien exhibitor, or holder of concession or privilege for any fair or exposition authorized by act of Congress, from bringing into the United States, under contract, such otherwise admissible alien mechanics, artisans, agents, or other employees, natives of his country as may be necessary for installing or conducting his exhibit or for preparing for installing or conducting any business authorized or permitted under any concession or privilege which may have been or may be granted by any such fair or exposition in connection therewith, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, may prescribe both as to the admission and return of such persons: Provided further, That the Commissioner General of Immigration with the approval of the Secretary of Labor shall issue rules and prescribe conditions, including exaction of such bonds as may be necessary to control and regulate the admission and return of students and others applying for temporary admission: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to accredited officials of foreign Governments, nor to their suites, families, or guests.

That the importation into the United States of any alien for the purpose of prostitution, or for any other immoral purpose, is hereby forbidden; and whoever shall, directly or indirectly, import, or attempt to import into the United States any alien for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose, or shall hold or attempt to hold any alien for any such purpose in pursuance of such illegal importation, or shall keep, maintain, control, support, employ, or harbor in any house or other place, for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose, any alien, in pursuance of such illegal importation, shall in every such case be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not more than 10 years and by a fine of not more than $5,000. Jurisdiction for the trial and punishment of the felonies hereinbefore set forth shall be in any district to or into which said alien is brought in pursuance of said importation by the person or persons accused, or in any district in which a violation of any of the foregoing provisions of this section occurs. That any alien who shall, after he has been excluded and deported or arrested and deported in pursuance of the provisions of this act which relate to prostitutes, procurers, or other like immoral persons, attempt thereafter to return to or to enter the United States shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not more than two years. In all prosecutions under this section the testimony of a husband or wife shall be admissible and competent evidence against each other.

That it shall be unlawful for any person, company, partnership, or corporation, in any manner whatsoever, to prepay the transportation or in any way to induce, assist, encourage, or solicit, or attempt to induce, assist, encourage, or solicit the importation or migration of any contract laborer or contract laborers into the United States, unless such contract laborer or contract laborers are exempted under the fifth proviso of section 3 of this act, or have been imported with the permission of the Secretary of Labor in accordance with the fourth proviso of said section, and for every violation of any of the provisions of this section the person, partnership, company, or corporation violating the same shall forfeit and pay for every such offense the sum of $1,000, which may be sued for and recovered by the United States, as debts of like amount are now recovered in the courts of the United States. For every violation of the provisions hereof the person violating the same may be prosecuted in a criminal action for a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term of not less than six months nor more than two years; and under either the civil or the criminal procedure mentioned separate suits or prosecutions may be brought for each alien thus offered or promised employment as aforesaid. The Department of Justice, with the approval of the Department of Labor, may from any fines or penalties received pay rewards to persons, other than Government employees, who may furnish information leading to the recovery of any such penalties, or to the arrest and punishment of any person, as in this section provided.

That it shall be unlawful and be deemed a violation of section 5 of this act to induce, assist, encourage, or solicit, or attempt to induce, assist, encourage, or solicit, any alien to come into the United States by promise of employment through advertisements printed, published, or distributed in any foreign country, whether such promise is true or false, and either the civil or criminal penalty, or both, imposed by said section shall be applicable to such a case.

That it shall be unlawful for any person, association, society, company, partnership, corporation, or others engaged in the business of transporting aliens to or within the United States, including owners, masters, officers, and agents of vessels, directly or indirectly, by writing, printing, oral representation, payment of any commissions to an alien coming into the United States, allowance of any rebates to an alien coming into the United States, or otherwise to solicit, invite, or encourage, or attempt to solicit, invite, or encourage, any alien to come into the United States, and anyone violating any provision hereof shall be subject to either the civil or the criminal prosecution, or both, prescribed by section 5 of this act; or if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that any owner, master, officer, or agent of a vessel has brought, or caused to be brought, to a port of the United States any alien so solicited, invited, or encouraged to come by such owner, master, officer, or agent, such owner, master, officer, or agent shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located, or in which any vessel of the line may be found, the sum of $400 for each and every such violation; and no vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine imposed remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such questions upon the deposit with the collector of customs of a sum sufficient to cover such fine: Provided further, That whenever it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that the provisions of this section are persistently violated by or on behalf of any transportation company, it shall be the duty of said Secretary to deny to such company the privilege of landing alien immigrant passengers of any or all classes at United States ports for such a period as in his judgment may be necessary to insure an observance of such provisions: Provided further, That this section shall not be held to prevent transportation companies from issuing letters, circulars, or advertisements, confined strictly to stating the sailing of their vessels and terms and facilities of transportation therein: Provided further, That under sections 5, 6, and 7 hereof it shall be presumed from the fact that any person, company, partnership, corporation, association, or society induces, assists, encourages, solicits, or invites, or attempts to induce, assist, encourage, solicit, or invite, the importation, migration, or coming of an alien from a country foreign to the United States, that the offender had knowledge of such person's alienage.

That any person, including the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any vessel, who shall bring into or land in the United States, by vessel or otherwise, or shall attempt, by himself or through another, to bring into or land in the United States, by vessel or otherwise, or shall conceal or harbor, or attempt to conceal or harbor, or assist or abet another to conceal or harbor in any place, including any building, vessel, railway car, conveyance, or vehicle, any alien not duly admitted by an immigrant inspector or not lawfully entitled to enter or to reside within the United States under the terms of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $2,000 and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years for each and every alien so landed or brought in or attempted to be landed or brought in.

That it shall be unlawful for any person, including any transportation company other than railway lines entering the United States from foreign contiguous territory, or the owner, master, agent, or consignee of any vessel, to bring to the United States either from a foreign country or any insular possession of the United States any alien afflicted with idiocy, insanity, imbecility, feeble-mindedness, epilepsy, constitutional psycopathic inferiority, chronic alcoholism, tuberculosis in any form, or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was afflicted with any of the said diseases or disabilities at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such disease or disability might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person or transportation company, or the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $200, and in addition a sum equal to that paid by such alien for his transportation from the initial point of departure, indicated in his ticket, to the port of arrival for each and every violation of the provisions of this section, such latter sum to be delivered by the collector of customs to the alien on whose account assessed. It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States any alien afflicted with any mental defect other than those above specifically named, or physical defect of a nature which may affect his ability to earn a living, as contemplated in section 3 of this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was so afflicted at the time of foreign embarkation and that the existence of such mental or physical defect might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $25, and in addition a sum equal to that paid by such alien for his transportation from the initial point of departure, indicated in his ticket, to the port of arrival for each and every violation of this provision, such latter sum to be delivered by the collector of customs to the alien for whose account assessed. It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States any alien who is excluded by the provisions of section 3 of this act because unable to read, or who are Hindus, or who can not become eligible under existing law to become a citizen of the United States by naturalization, as provided in section 3 of this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that these disabilities might have been detected by the exercise of reasonable precaution prior to the departure of such aliens from a foreign port, such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $200, and in addition a sum equal to that paid by such alien for his transportation from the initial point of departure, indicated in his ticket, to the port of arrival for each and every violation of this provision, such latter sum to be delivered by the collector of customs to the alien on whose account assessed. And no vessel shall be granted clearance papers pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine or while the fine remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such questions upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine: Provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to subject transportation companies to a fine for bringing to ports of the United States aliens who are by any of the provisions or exceptions to section 3 hereof exempted from the excluding provisions of said section.

That it shall be the duty of every person, including owners, officers, and agents of vessels or transportation lines, or international bridges or toll roads other than railway lines which may enter into a contract as provided in section 23 of this act, bringing an alien to, or providing a means for an alien to come to, any seaport or land border port of the United States, to prevent the landing of such alien in the United States at any time or place other than as designated by the immigration officers, and the failure of any such person, owner, officer, or agent to comply with the foregoing requirements shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine in each case of not less than $200 nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment; or, if in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor it is impracticable or inconvenient to prosecute the person, owner, master, officer, or agent of any such vessel, a penalty of $1,000 shall be a lien upon the vessel whose owner, master, officer, or agent violates the provisions of this section, and such vessel shall be libeled therefor in the appropriate United States court.

That for the purpose of determining whether aliens arriving at ports of the United States belong to any of the classes excluded by this act, either by reason of being afflicted with any of the diseases or mental or physical defects or disabilities mentioned in section 3 hereof, or otherwise, or whenever the Secretary of Labor has received information showing that any aliens are coming from a country or have embarked at a place where any of said diseases are prevalent or epidemic, the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, may direct that such aliens shall be detained on board the vessel bringing them, or in a United States immigration station at the expense of such vessel, as circumstances may require or justify, a sufficient time to enable the immigration officers and medical officers stationed at such ports to subject such aliens to an observation and examination sufficient to determine whether or not they belong to the said excluded classes by reason of being afflicted in the manner indicated: Provided, That, with a view to avoid undue delay in landing passengers or interference with commerce, the Commissioner General of Immigration may, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, issue such regulations, not inconsistent with law, as may be deemed necessary to effect the purposes of this section: Provided further, That it shall be the duty of immigrant inspectors to report to the Commissioner General of Immigration the condition of all vessels bringing aliens to United States ports.

That upon the arrival of any alien by water at any port within the United States on the North American Continent from a foreign port or a port of the Philippine Islands, Guam, Porto Rico, or Hawaii, or at any port of the said insular possessions from any foreign port, from a port in the United States on the North American Continent, or from a port of another insular possession of the United States, it shall be the duty of the master or commanding officer, owners, or consignees of the steamer, sailing, or other vessel having said alien on board to deliver to the immigration officers at the port of arrival typewritten or printed lists or manifests made at the time and place of embarkation of such alien on board such steamer or vessel, which shall, in answer to questions at the top of said list, contain full and accurate information as to each alien as follows: Full name, age, and sex; whether married or single; calling or occupation; personal description (including height, complexion, color of hair and eyes, and marks of identification); whether able to read or write; nationality; country of birth; race; country of last permanent residence; name and address of the nearest relative in the country from which the alien came; seaport for landing in the United States; final destination, if any, beyond the port of landing; whether having a ticket through to such final destination; by whom passage was paid; whether in possession of $50, and if less, how much; whether going to join a relative or friend, and if so, what relative or friend, and his or her name and complete address; whether ever before in the United States, and if so, when and where; whether ever in prison or almshouse, or an institution or hospital for the care and treatment of the insane; whether ever supported by charity; whether a polygamist; whether an anarchist; whether a person who believes in or advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law, or who disbelieves in or is opposed to organized government, or who advocates the assassination of public officials, or who advocates or teaches the unlawful destruction of property, or is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or which teaches the unlawful destruction of property, or who advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government because of his or their official character; whether coming by reason of any offer, solicitation, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to perform labor in the United States; the alien's condition of health, mental and physical; whether deformed or crippled, and if so, for how long and from what cause; and such master or commanding officer, owners, or consignees shall also furnish information in relation to the sex, age, class of travel, and the foreign port of embarkation of arriving passengers who are United States citizens. That it shall further be the duty of the master or commanding officer of every vessel taking passengers from any port of the United States on the North American Continent to a foreign port or a port of the Philippine Islands, Guam, Porto Rico, or Hawaii, or from any port of the said insular possessions to any foreign port, to a port of the United States on the North American Continent, or to a port of another insular possession of the United States to file with the immigration officials before departure a list which shall contain full and accurate information in relation to the following matters regarding all alien passengers, and all citizens of the United States or insular possessions of the United States departing with the stated intent to reside permanently in a foreign country, taken on board: Name, age, and sex; whether married or single; calling or occupation; whether able to read or write; nationality; country of birth, country of which citizen or subject; race; last permanent residence in the United States or insular possessions thereof; if a citizen of the United States or of the insular possessions thereof, whether native born or naturalized; if native born, the place and date of birth, or if naturalized the city or town in which naturalization has been had; intended future permanent residence; and time and port of last arrival in the United States, or insular possessions thereof; and such master or commanding officer shall also furnish information in relation to the sex, age, class of travel, and port of debarkation of the United States citizens departing who do not intend to reside permanently in a foreign country, and no master of any such vessel shall be granted clearance papers for his vessel until he has deposited such list or lists with the immigration officials at the port of departure and made oath that they are full and complete as to the name and other information herein required concerning each person of the classes specified taken on board his vessel; and any neglect or omission to comply with the requirements of this section shall be punishable as provided in section 14 of this act: Provided, That in the case of vessels making regular trips to ports of the United States the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, may, when expedient, arrange for the delivery of such lists of outgoing aliens at a later date: Provided further, That it shall be the duty of immigration officials to record the following information regarding every resident alien and citizen leaving the United States by way of the Canadian or Mexican borders for permanent residence in a foreign country: Name, age, and sex; whether married or single; calling or occupation; whether able to read or write; nationality; country of birth; country of which citizen or subject; race; last permanent residence in the United States; intended future permanent residence; and time and port of last arrival in the United States; and if a United States citizen, whether native born or naturalized.

That all aliens arriving by water at the ports of the United States shall be listed in convenient groups, the names of those coming from the same locality to be assembled so far as practicable, and no one list or manifest shall contain more than 30 names. To each alien or head of a family shall be given a ticket on which shall be written his name, a number or letter designating the list in which his name, and other items of information required by this act are contained, and his number on said list, for convenience of identification on arrival. Each list or manifest shall be verified by the signature and the oath or affirmation of the master or commanding officer, or the first or second below him in command, taken before an immigration officer at the port of arrival, to the effect that he has caused the surgeon of said vessel sailing therewith to make a physical and mental examination of each of said aliens, and that from the report of said surgeon and from his own investigation he believes that no one of said aliens is of any of the classes excluded from admission into the United States by section 3 of this act, and that also according to the best of his knowledge and belief the information in said lists or manifests concerning each of said aliens named therein is correct and true in every respect. That the surgeon of said vessel sailing therewith shall also sign each of said lists or manifests and make oath or affirmation in like manner before an immigration officer at the port of arrival, stating his professional experience and qualifications as a physician and surgeon, and that he has made a personal examination of each of the said aliens named therein, and that the said list or manifest, according to the best of his knowledge and belief, is full, correct, and true in all particulars relative to the mental and physical condition of said aliens. If no surgeon sails with any vessel bringing aliens, the mental and physical examinations and the verifications of the lists or manifests shall be made by some competent surgeon employed by the owners of the said vessels, and the manifests shall be verified by such surgeon before a United States consular officer or other officer authorized to administer oaths: Provided, That if any changes in the condition of such aliens occur or develop during the voyage of the vessel on which they are travelling, such changes shall be noted on the manifest before the verification thereof.

That it shall be unlawful for the master or commanding officer of any vessel bringing aliens into or carrying aliens out of the United States to refuse or fail to deliver to the immigration officials the accurate and full manifests or statements or information regarding all aliens on board or taken on board such vessel required by this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that there has been such a refusal or failure, or that the lists delivered are not accurate and full, such master or commanding officer shall pay to the collector of customs at the port of arrival or departure the sum of $10 for each alien concerning whom such accurate and full manifest or statement or information is not furnished, or concerning whom the manifest or statement or information is not prepared and sworn to as prescribed by this act. No vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while it remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit with the collector of customs of a sum sufficient to cover such fine.

That upon the arrival at a port of the United States of any vessel bringing aliens it shall be the duty of the proper immigration officials to go or to send competent assistants to the vessel and there inspect all such aliens, or said immigration officials may order a temporary removal of such aliens for examination at a designated time and place, but such temporary removal shall not be considered a landing, nor shall it relieve vessels, the transportation lines, masters, agents, owners, or consignees of the vessel upon which said aliens are brought to any port of the United States from any of the obligations which, in case such aliens remain on board, would under the provisions of this act bind the said vessels, transportation lines, masters, agents, owners, or consignees: Provided, That where removal is made to premises owned or controlled by the United States, said vessels, transportation lines, masters, agents, owners, or consignees, and each of them, shall, so long as detention there lasts, be relieved of responsibility for the safekeeping of such aliens. Whenever a temporary removal of aliens is made the vessels or transportation lines which brought them and the masters, owners, agents, and consignees of the vessel upon which they arrive shall pay all expenses of such removal and all expenses arising during subsequent detention, pending decision on the aliens' eligibility to enter the United States and until they are either allowed to land or returned to the care of the line or to the vessel which brought them, such expenses to include those of maintenance, medical treatment in hospital or elsewhere, burial in the event of death, and transfer to the vessel in the event of deportation, excepting only where they arise under the terms of any of the provisions of section 18 hereof. Any refusal or failure to comply with the provisions hereof shall be punished in the manner specified in section 18 of this act.

That the physical and mental examination of all arriving aliens shall be made by medical officers of the United States Public Health Service who shall have had at least two years' experience in the practice of their profession since receiving the degree of doctor of medicine, and who shall certify, for the information of the immigration officers and the boards of special inquiry hereinafter provided for, any and all physical and mental defects or diseases observed by said medical officers in any such alien; or, should medical officers of the United States Public Health Service be not available, civil surgeons of not less than four years' professional experience may be employed in such emergency for such service upon such terms as may be prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Labor. All aliens arriving at ports of the United States shall be examined by not less than two such medical officers at the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, and under such regulations as he may prescribe. Medical officers of the United States Public Health Service who have had especial training in the diagnosis of insanity and mental defects shall be detailed for duty or employed at all ports of entry designated by the Secretary of Labor, and such medical officers shall be provided with suitable facilities for the detention and examination of all arriving aliens in whom insanity or mental defect is suspected, and the services of interpreters shall be provided for such examination. Any alien certified for insanity or mental defect may appeal to a Board of Surgeons of the Public Health Service, and may introduce before such board one expert medical witness at his own cost and expense. That the inspection, other than the physical and mental examination, of aliens, including those seeking admission or readmission to or the privilege of passing through or residing in the United States, and the examination of aliens arrested within the United States under this act, shall be conducted by immigrant inspectors, except as hereinafter provided in regard to boards of special inquiry. All aliens arriving at ports of the United States shall be examined by at least two immigrant inspectors at the discretion of the Secretary of Labor and under such regulations as he may prescribe. Immigrant inspectors are hereby authorized and empowered to board and search for aliens any vessel, railway car, or any other conveyance, or vehicle in which they believe aliens are being brought into the United States. Said inspectors shall have power to administer oaths and to take and consider evidence touching the right of any alien to enter, reenter, pass through, or reside in the United States, and, where such action may be necessary, to make a written record of such evidence; and any person to whom such an oath has been administered, under the provisions of this act, who shall knowingly or willfully give false evidence or swear to any false statement in any way affecting or in relation to the right of any alien to admission, or readmission to, or to pass through, or to reside in the United States shall be deemed guilty of perjury and be punished as provided by section 125 of the act approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States." Any commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge shall also have power to require by subpœna the attendance and testimony of witnesses before said inspectors and the production of books, papers, and documents touching the right of any alien to enter, reenter, reside in, or pass through the United States, and to that end may invoke the aid of any court of the United States; and any district court within the jurisdiction of which investigations are being conducted by an immigrant inspector may, in the event of neglect or refusal to respond to a subpœna issued by any commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge or refusal to testify before said immigrant inspector, issue an order requiring such person to appear before said immigrant inspector, produce books, papers, and documents if demanded, and testify; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by the court as a contempt thereof. That any person, including employees, officials, or agents of transportation companies, who shall assault, resist, prevent, impede, or interfere with any immigration official or employee in the performance of his duty under this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not more than one year, or by a fine of not more than $2,000, or both; and any person who shall use any deadly or dangerous weapon in resisting any immigration official or employee in the performance of his duty shall be deemed guilty of a felony and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than 10 years. Every alien who may not appear to the examining immigrant inspector at the port of arrival to be clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to land shall be detained for examination in relation thereto by a board of special inquiry. In the event of rejection by the board of special inquiry, in all cases where an appeal to the Secretary of Labor is permitted by this act, the alien shall be so informed and shall have the right to be represented by counsel or other adviser on such appeal. The decision of an immigrant inspector, if favorable to the admission of any alien, shall be subject to challenge by any other immigrant inspector, and such challenge shall operate to take the alien whose right to land is so challenged before a board of special inquiry for its investigation.

That boards of special inquiry shall be appointed by the commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge at the various ports of arrival as may be necessary for the prompt determination of all cases of immigrants detained at such ports under the provisions of the law. Each board shall consist of three members, who shall be selected from such of the immigrant officials in the service as the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, shall from time to time designate as qualified to serve on such boards. When in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor the maintenance of a permanent board of special inquiry for service at any sea or land border port is not warranted, regularly constituted boards may be detailed from other stations for temporary service at such port, or, if that be impracticable, the Secretary of Labor shall authorize the creation of boards of special inquiry by the immigration officials in charge at such ports, and shall determine what Government officials or other persons shall be eligible for service on such boards. Such boards shall have authority to determine whether an alien who has been duly held shall be allowed to land or shall be deported. All hearings before such boards shall be separate and apart from the public, but the immigrant may have one friend or relative present under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Labor. Such boards shall keep a complete permanent record of their proceedings and of all such testimony as may be produced before them; and the decisions of any two members of the board shall prevail, but either the alien or any dissenting member of the said board may appeal through the commissioner of immigration at the port of arrival and the Commissioner General of Immigration to the Secretary of Labor, and the taking of such appeal shall operate to stay any action in regard to the final disposal of any alien whose case is so appealed until the receipt by the commissioner of immigration at the port of arrival of such decision which shall be rendered solely upon the evidence adduced before the board of special inquiry. In every case where an alien is excluded from admission into the United States, under any law or treaty now existing or hereafter made, the decision of a board of special inquiry adverse to the admission of such alien shall be final, unless reversed on appeal to the Secretary of Labor: Provided, That the decision of a board of special inquiry shall be based upon the certificate of the examining medical officer and, except as provided in section 21 hereof, shall be final as to the rejection of aliens affected with tuberculosis in any form or with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, or with any mental or physical disability which would bring such aliens within any of the classes excluded from admission to the United States under section 3 of this act.

That all aliens brought to this country in violation of law shall be immediately sent back, in accommodations of the same class in which they arrived, to the country whence they respectively came, on the vessels bringing them, unless in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor immediate deportation is not practical or proper. The cost of their maintenance while on land, as well as the expense of the return of such aliens, shall be borne by the owner or owners of the vessels on which they respectively came. That it shall be unlawful for any master, purser, person in charge, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel to refuse to receive back on board thereof, or on board of any other vessel owned or operated by the same interests, such aliens; or to fail to detain them thereon; or to refuse or fail to return them in the manner aforesaid to the foreign port from which they came; or to fail to pay the cost of their maintenance while on land; or to make any charge for the return of any such alien, or to take any security for the payment of such charge; or to take any consideration to be returned in case the alien is landed; or knowingly to bring to the United States at any time within one year from the date of deportation any alien rejected or arrested and deported under any provision of this act, unless prior to reembarkation the Secretary of Labor has consented that such alien shall reapply for admission, as required by section 3 hereof; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that such master, purser, person in charge, agent, owner, or consignee has violated any of the foregoing provisions, or any of the provisions of section 15 hereof, such master, purser, person in charge, agent, owner, or consignee shall pay to the collector of customs of the district in which the port of arrival is located, or in which any vessel of the line may be found, the sum of $300 for each and every violation of any provision of said sections; and no vessel shall have clearance from any port of the United States while any such fine is unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit with the collector of customs of a sum sufficient to cover such fine. If the vessel by which any alien ordered deported came has left the United States and it is impracticable for any reason to deport the alien within a reasonable time by another vessel owned by the same interests, the cost of deportation may be paid by the Government and recovered by civil suit from any agent, owner, or consignee of the vessel: Provided further, That the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, may suspend, upon conditions to be prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, the deportation of any aliens found to have come in violation of any provision of this act if, in his judgment, the testimony of such alien is necessary on behalf of the United States Government in the prosecution of offenders against any provision of this act or other laws of the United States; and the cost of maintenance of any person so detained resulting from such suspension of deportation, and a witness fee in the sum of $1 per day for each day such person is so detained, may be paid from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, or such alien may be released under bond, in the penalty of not less than $500, with security approved by the Secretary of Labor, conditioned that such alien shall be produced when required as a witness and for deportation. No alien certified, as provided in section 16 of this act, to be suffering from tuberculosis in any form, or from a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease other than one of quarantinable nature, shall be permitted to land for medical treatment thereof in any hospital in the United States, unless the Secretary of Labor is satisfied that to refuse treatment would be inhumane or cause unusual hardship or suffering, in which case the alien shall be treated in the hospital under the supervision of the immigration officials at the expense of the vessel transporting him: Provided further, That upon the certificate of an examining medical officer to the effect that the health or safety of an insane alien would be unduly imperiled by immediate deportation, such alien may, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, be held for treatment until such time as such alien may, in the opinion of such medical officer, be safely deported: Provided further, That upon the certificate of an examining medical officer to the effect that a rejected alien is helpless from sickness, mental or physical disability, or infancy, if such alien is accompanied by another alien whose protection or guardianship is required by such rejected alien, such accompanying alien may also be excluded, and the master, agent, owner, or consignee of the vessel in which such alien and accompanying alien are brought shall be required to return said alien and accompanying alien in the same manner as vessels are required to return other rejected aliens.

That at any time within five years after entry, any alien who at the time of entry was a member of one or more of the classes excluded by law; any alien who shall have entered or who shall be found in the United States in violation of this act, or in violation of any other law of the United States; any alien who at any time after entry shall be found advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property, or advocating or teaching anarchy, or the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law or the assassination of public officials; any alien who within five years after entry becomes a public charge from causes not affirmatively shown to have arisen subsequent to landing; except as hereinafter provided, any alien who is hereafter sentenced to imprisonment for a term of one year or more because of conviction in this country of a crime involving moral turpitude, committed within five years after the entry of the alien to the United States, or who is hereafter sentenced more than once to such a term of imprisonment because of conviction in this country of any crime involving moral turpitude, committed at any time after entry; any alien who shall be found an inmate of or connected with the management of a house of prostitution or practicing prostitution after such alien shall have entered the United States, or who shall receive, share in, or derive benefit from any part of the earnings of any prostitute; any alien who manages or is employed by, in, or in connection with any house of prostitution or music or dance hall or other place of amusement or resort habitually frequented by prostitutes, or where prostitutes gather, or who in any way assists any prostitute or protects or promises to protect from arrest any prostitute; any alien who shall import or attempt to import any person for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; any alien who, after being excluded and deported or arrested and deported as a prostitute, or as a procurer, or as having been connected with the business of prostitution or importation for prostitution or other immoral purposes in any of the ways hereinbefore specified, shall return to and enter the United States; any alien convicted and imprisoned for a violation of any of the provisions of section 4 hereof, any alien who was convicted, or who admits the commission, prior to entry, of a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude; at any time within three years after entry, any alien who shall have entered the United States by water at any time or place other than as designated by immigration officials, or by land at any place other than one designated as a port of entry for aliens by the Commissioner General of Immigration, or at any time not designated by immigration officials, or who enters without inspection, shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into custody and deported: Provided, That the marriage to an American citizen of a female of the sexually immoral classes the exclusion or deportation of which is prescribed by this act shall not invest such female with United States citizenship if the marriage of such alien female shall be solemnized after her arrest or after the commission of acts which make her liable to deportation under this act: Provided further, That the provision of this section respecting the deportation of aliens convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude shall not apply to one who has been pardoned, nor shall such deportation be made or directed if the court, or judge thereof, sentencing such alien for such crime shall, at the time of imposing judgment or passing sentence or within 30 days thereafter, due notice having first been given to representatives of the State, make a recommendation to the Secretary of Labor that such alien shall not be deported in pursuance of this act; nor shall any alien convicted as aforesaid be deported until after the termination of his imprisonment: Provided further, That the provisions of this section, with the exceptions hereinbefore noted, shall be applicable to the classes of aliens therein mentioned irrespective of the time of their entry into the United States: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall also apply to the cases of aliens who come to the mainland of the United States from the insular possessions thereof: Provided further, That any person who shall be arrested under the provisions of this section, on the ground that he has entered or been found in the United States in violation of any other law thereof which imposes on such person the burden of proving his right to enter or remain, and who shall fail to establish the existence of the right claimed, shall be deported to the place specified in such other law. In every case where any person is ordered deported from the United States under the provision of this act, or of any law or treaty, the decision of the Secretary of Labor shall be final.

That the deportation of aliens provided for in this act shall, at the option of the Secretary of Labor, be to the country whence they came or to the foreign port at which such aliens embarked for the United States; or, if such embarkation was for foreign contiguous territory, to the foreign port at which they embarked for such territory; or, if such aliens entered foreign contiguous territory from the United States and later entered the United States, or if such aliens are held by the country from which they entered the United States not to be subjects or citizens of such country, and such country refuses to permit their reeatry, or imposes any condition upon permitting reentry, then to the country of which such aliens are subjects or citizens, or to the country in which they resided prior to entering the country from which they entered the United States. If deportation proceedings are instituted at any time within five years after the entry of the alien, such deportation, including one-half of the entire cost of removal to the port of deportation, shall be at the expense of the contractor, procurer, or other person by whom the alien was unlawfully induced to enter the United States, or, if that can not be done, then the cost of removal to the port of deportation shall be at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, and the deportation from such port shall be at the expense of the owner or owners of such vessels or transportation line by which such aliens respectively came, or, if that is not practicable, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. If deportation proceedings are instituted later than five years after the entry of the alien, or, if the deportation is made by reason of causes arising subsequent to entry, the cost thereof shall be payable from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. A failure or refusal on the part of the masters, agents, owners, or consignees of vessels to comply with the order of the Secretary of Labor to take on board, guard safely, and transport to the destination specified any alien ordered to be deported under the provisions of this act shall be punished by the imposition of the penalties prescribed in section 18 of this act· Provided, That when in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor the menta or physical condition of such alien is such as to require personal care and attendance, the said Secretary shall when necessary employ a suitable person for that purpose, who shall accompany such alien to his or her final destination, and the expense incident to such service shall be defrayed in the same manner as the expense of deporting the accompanied alien is defrayed. Pending the final disposal of the case of any alien so taken into custody, he may be released under a bond in the penalty of not less than $500 with security approved by the Secretary of Labor, conditioned that such alien shall be produced when required for a hearing or hearings in regard to the charge upon which he has been taken into custody, and for deportation if he shall be found to be unlawfully within the United States.

That any alien liable to be excluded because likely to become a public charge or because of physical disability other than tuberculosis in any form or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease may, if otherwise admissible, nevertheless be admitted in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor upon the giving of a suitable and proper bond or undertaking, approved by said Secretary, in such amount and containing such conditions as he may prescribe, to the United States and to all States, Territories, counties, towns, municipalities, and districts thereof, holding the United States and all States, Territories, counties, towns, municipalities, and districts thereof harmless against such alien becoming a public charge. In lieu of such bond, such alien may deposit in cash with the Secretary of Labor such amount as the Secretary of Labor may require, which amount shall be deposited by said Secretary in the United States Postal Savings Bank, a receipt therefor to be given the person furnishing said sum, showing the fact and object of its receipt and such other information as said Secretary may deem advisable. All accruing interest on said deposit during the time same shall be held in the United States Postal Savings Bank shall be paid to the person furnishing the sum for deposit. In the event of such alien becoming a public charge, the Secretary of Labor shall dispose of said deposit in the same manner as if same had been collected under a bond as provided in this section. In the event of the permanent departure from the United States, the naturalization, or the death of such alien, the said sum shall be returned to the person by whom furnished, or to his legal representatives. The admission of such alien shall be a consideration for the giving of such bond, undertaking, or a cash deposit. Suit may be brought thereon in the name and by the proper law officers either of the United States Government or of any State, Territory, District, county, town, or municipality in which such alien becomes a public charge.

That whenever an alien shall have been naturalized or shall have taken up his permanent residence in this country and shall have filed his declaration of intention to become a citizen, and thereafter shall send for his wife or minor children to join him, and said wife or any of said minor children shall be found to be affected with any contagious disorder, such wife or minor children shall be held, under such regulations as the Secretary of Labor shall prescribe, until it shall be determined whether the disorder will be easily curable or whether they can be permitted to land without danger to other persons; and they shall not be either admitted or deported until such facts have been ascertained; and if it shall be determined that the disorder is easily curable and the husband or father or other responsible person is willing to bear the expense of the treatment, they may be accorded treatment in hospital until cured and then be admitted, or if it shall be determined that they can be permitted to land without danger to other persons, they may, if otherwise admissible, thereupon be admitted: Provided, That if the person sending for wife or minor children is naturalized, a wife to whom married or a minor child born subsequent to such husband or father's naturalization shall be admitted without detention for treatment in hospital, and with respect to a wife to whom married or a minor child born prior to such husband's or father's naturalization the provisions of this section shall be observed, even though such person is unable to pay the expense of treatment, in which case the expense shall be paid from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act.

That the Commissioner General of Immigration shall perform all his duties under the direction of the Secretary of Labor. Under such direction he shall have charge of the administration of all laws relating to the immigration of aliens into the United States, and shall have the control direction, and supervision of all officers, clerks, and employees appointed thereunder; he shall establish such rules and regulations, prescribe such forms of bonds, reports, entries, and other papers, and shall issue from time to time such instructions not inconsistent with law, as he shall deem best calculated for carrying out the provisions of this act and for protecting the United States and aliens migrating thereto from fraud and loss, and shall have authority to enter into contract for the support and relief of such aliens as may fall into distress or need public aid, and to remove to their native country, at any time within three years after entry, at the expense of the appropriations for the enforcement of this act, such as fall into distress or need public aid from causes arising subsequent to their entry and are desirous of being so removed; he shall prescribe rules for the entry and inspection of aliens coming to the United States from or through Canada and Mexico, so as not unnecessarily to delay, impede, or annoy persons in ordinary travel between the United States and said countries, and shall have power to enter into contracts with transportation lines for the said purpose; it shall be the duty of the Commissioner General of Immigration to detail officers of the Immigration Service from time to time as may be necessary, in his judgment, to secure information as to the number of aliens detained in the penal, reformatory, and charitable institutions (public and private) of the several States and Territories, the District of Columbia, and other territory of the United States, and to inform the officers of such institutions of the provisions of law in relation to the deportation of aliens who have become public charges. He may, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, whenever in his judgment such action may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act, detail immigration officers, and also surgeons of the United States Public Health Service employed under this act for service in foreign countries. The duties of commissioners of immigration and other immigration officials in charge of districts, ports, or stations shall be of an administrative character, to be prescribed in detail by regulations prepared under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Labor: Provided, That no person, company, or transportation line engaged in carrying alien passengers for hire from Canada or Mexico to the United States, whether by land or water, shall be allowed to land any such passengers in the United States without providing suitable and approved landing stations, conveniently located, at the point or points of entry. The Commissioner General of Immigration is hereby authorized and empowered to prescribe the conditions, not inconsistent with law, under which the above-mentioned landing stations shall be deemed suitable within the meaning of this section. Any person, company, or transportation line landing an alien passenger in the United States without compliance with the requirement herein set forth shall be deemed to have violated section 8 of this act, and upon conviction shall be subject to the penalty therein prescribed: Provided further, That for the purpose of making effective the provisions of this section relating to the protection of aliens from fraud and loss, and also the provisions of section 30 of this act, relating to the distribution of aliens, the Secretary of Labor shall establish and maintain immigrant stations at such interior places as may be necessary, and, in the discretion of the said Secretary, aliens in transit from ports of landing to such interior stations shall be accompanied by immigrant inspectors: Provided further, That in prescribing rules and making contracts for the entry and inspection of aliens applying for admission from or through foreign contiguous territory, due care shall be exercised to avoid any discriminatory action in favor of foreign transportation companies transporting to such territory aliens destined to the United States, and all such transportation companies shall be required, as a condition precedent to the inspection or examination under such rules and contracts at the ports of such contigious territory of aliens brought thereto by them, to submit to and comply with all the requirements of this act which would apply were they bringing such aliens directly to seaports of the United States, and, from and after the taking effect of this act, no alien applying for admission from foreign contiguous territory shall be permitted to enter the United States unless upon proving that he was brought to such territory by a transportation company which had submitted to and complied with all the requirements of this act, or that he entered, or has resided in, such territory more than two years prior to the date of his application for admission to the United States.

That immigrant inspectors and other immigration officers, clerks, and employees shall hereafter be appointed and their compensation fixed and raised or decreased from time to time by the Secretary of Labor, upon the recommendation of the Commissioner General of Immigration and in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service act of January 16, 1883: Provided, That said Secretary, in the enforcement of that portion of this act which excludes contract laborers and induced and assisted immigrants, may employ for such purposes and for detail upon additional service under this act when not so engaged, without reference to the provisions of the said civil-service act, or to the various acts relative to the compilation of the Official Register, such persons as he may deem advisable and from time to time fix, raise, or decrease their compensation. He may draw annually from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act $100,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended for the salaries and expenses of persons so employed and for expenses incident to such employment; and the accounting officers of the Treasury shall pass to the credit of the proper disbursing officer expenditures from said sum without itemized account whenever the Secretary of Labor certifies that an itemized account would not be for the best interests of the Government: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to alter the mode of appointing commissioners of immgration at the several ports of the United States as provided by the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 18, 1894, or the official status of such commissioners heretofore appointed.

That the district courts of the United States are hereby invested with full jurisdiction of all causes, civil and criminal, arising under any of the provisions of this act. That it shall be the duty of the United States district attorney of the proper district to prosecute every such suit when brought by the United States under this act. Such prosecutions or suits may be instituted at any place in the United States at which the violation may occur or at which the person charged with such violation may be found. That no suit or proceeding for a violation of the provisions of this act shall be settled, compromised, or discontinued without the consent of the court in which it is pending, entered of record, with the reasons therefor.

That all exclusive privileges of exchanging money, transporting passengers or baggage, or keeping eating houses, and all other like privileges in connection with any United States immigrant station, shall be disposed of to the lowest responsible and capable bidder after public competition, notice of such competitive bidding having been made in two newspapers of general circulation for a period of two weeks, subject to such conditions and limitations as the Commissioner General of Immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, may prescribe, and all receipts accruing from the disposal of privileges shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States. No such contract shall be awarded to an alien. No intoxicating liquors shall be sold at any such immigration station.

That for the preservation of the peace and in order that arrests may be made for crimes under the laws of the States and Territories of the United States where the various immigrant stations are located, the officers in charge of such stations, as occasion may require, shall admit therein the proper State and municipal officers charged with the enforcement of such laws, and for the purpose of this section the jurisdiction of such officers and of the local courts shall extend over such stations.

Any person who knowingly aids or assists any alien who advocates or teaches the unlawful destruction of property to enter the United States shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

That the President of the United States is authorized, in the name of the Government of the United States, to call, in his discretion, an international conference, to assemble at such point as may be agreed upon, or to send special commissioners to any foreign country, for the purpose of regulating by international agreement, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, the immigration of aliens to the United States; of providing for the mental, moral, and physical examination of such aliens by American consuls or other officers of the United States Government at the ports of embarkation, or elsewhere; of securing the assistance of foreign Governments in their own territories to prevent the evasion of the laws of the United States governing immigration to the United States; of entering into such international agreements as may be proper to prevent the immigration of aliens who, under the laws of the United States, are or may be excluded from entering the United States, and of regulating any matters pertaining to such immigration.

That there shall be maintained a division of information in the Bureau of Immigration; and the Secretary of Labor shall provide such clerical and other assistance as may be necessary. It shall be the duty of said division to promote a beneficial distribution of aliens admitted into the United States among the several States and Territories desiring immigration. While on duty at any immigrant station such agents shall be subject to all the regulations prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, who, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, may, for violation of any such regulations, deny to the agent guilty of such violation any of the privileges herein granted.

That any person, including the owner, agent, consignee, or master of any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place, who shall knowingly sign on the ship's articles, or bring to the United States as one of the crew of such vessel, any alien, with intent to permit such alien to land in the United States in violation of the laws and treaties of the United States regulating the immigration of aliens, or who shall falsely and knowingly represent to the immigration authorities at the port of arrival that any such alien is a bona fide member of the crew, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding $5,000, for which sum the said vessel shall be liable and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense.

That no alien excluded from admission into the United States by any law, agreement, convention, or treaty of the United States regulating the immigration of aliens, and employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place, shall be permitted to land in the United States, except temporarily for medical treatment, or pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Labor providing for the ultimate removal or deportation of such alien from the United States, and the negligent failure of the owner, agent, consignee, or master of such vessel to detain on board any such alien after notice in writing by the immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival, and to deport such alien, if required by such immigration officer or by the Secretary of Labor, shall render such owner, agent, consignee, or master liable to a penalty not exceeding $1,000, for which sum the said vessel shall be liable, and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense.

That it shall be unlawful and be deemed a violation of the preceding section to pay off or discharge any alien employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place, unless duly admitted pursuant to the laws and treaties of the United States regulating the immigration of aliens: Provided, That in case any such alien intends to reship on board any other vessel bound to any foreign port or place, he shall be allowed to land for the purpose of so reshipping, under such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe to prevent aliens not admissible under any law, agreement, convention, or treaty from remaining permanently in the United States, and may be paid off, discharged, and permitted to remove his effects, anything in such laws or treaties or in this act to the contrary notwithstanding, provided due notice of such proposed action be given by the master or the seaman himself to the principal immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival.

That any alien seaman who shall land in a port of the United States contrary to the provisions of this act shall be deemed to be unlawfully in the United States, and shall, at any time within three years thereafter, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into custody and brought before a board of special inquiry for examination as to his qualifications for admission to the United States, and if not admitted said alien seaman shall be deported at the expense of the appropriation for this act as provided in section 20 of this act.

That it shall be unlawful for any vessel carrying passengers between a port of the United States and a port of a foreign country, upon arrival in the United States, to have on board employed thereon any alien afflicted with idiocy, imbecility, insanity, epilepsy, tuberculosis in any form, or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, if it appears to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor, from an examination made by a medical officer of the United States Public Health Service, and is so certified by such officer, that any such alien was so afflicted at the time he was shipped or engaged and taken on board such vessel and that the existence of such affliction might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time; and for every such alien so afflicted on board any such vessel at the time of arrival the owner, agent, consignee, or master thereof shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $50, and pending departure of the vessel the alien shall be detained and treated in hospital under supervision of immigration officials at the expense of the vessel; and no vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine and while it remains unpaid: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine: Provided further, That such fine may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, be mitigated or remitted.

That upon arrival of any vessel in the United States from any foreign port or place it shall be the duty of the owner, agent, consignee, or master thereof to deliver to the principal immigration officer in charge of the port of arrival lists containing the names of all aliens employed on such vessel, stating the positions they respectively hold in the ship's company, when and where they were respectively shipped or engaged, and specifying those to be paid off and discharged in the port of arrival; or lists containing so much of such information as the Secretary of Labor shall by regulation prescribe; and after the arrival of any such vessel it shall be the duty of such owner, agent, consignee, or master to report to such immigration officer, in writing, as soon as discovered, all cases in which any such alien has illegally landed from the vessel, giving a description of such alien, together with any information likely to lead to his apprehension; and before the departure of any such vessel it shall be the duty of such owner, agent, consignee, or master to deliver to such immigration officer a further list containing the names of all alien employees who were not employed thereon at the time of the arrival but who will leave port thereon at the time of her departure, and also the names of those, if any, who have been paid off and discharged, and of those, if any, who have deserted or landed; and in case of the failure of such owner, agent, consignee, or master so to deliver either of the said lists of such aliens arriving and departing, respectively, or so to report such cases of desertion or landing, such owner, agent, consignee, or master shall, if required by the Secretary of Labor, pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $10 for each alien concerning whom correct lists are not delivered or a true report is not made as above required; and no such vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, and, in the event such fine is imposed, while it remains unpaid; nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine.

That the word "person" as used in this act shall be construed to import both plural and the singular, as the case may be, and shall include corporations, companies, and associations. When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act, the act, omission, or failure of any director, officer, agent, or employee of any corporation, company, or association acting within the scope of his employment or office shall in every case be deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such corporation, company, or association, as well as that of the person acting for or in behalf of such corporation, company, or association.

That this act, except as otherwise provided in section 3, shall take effect and be enforced on and after July 1, 1916. The act of March 26, 1910, amending the act of February 20, 1907, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States; the act of February 20, 1907, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, except section 34 thereof; the act of March 3, 1903, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, except section 34 thereof; and all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed on and after the taking effect of this act: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to repeal, alter, or amend existing laws relating to the immigration or exclusion of Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent, except as provided in section 19 hereof, nor to repeal, alter, or amend section 6, chapter 453, third session Fifty-eighth Congress, approved February 6, 1905, nor to repeal, alter, or amend the act approved August 2, 1882, entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea," and amendments thereto, except as provided in section 11 hereof: Provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect any prosecution, suit, action, or proceedings brought, or any act, thing, or matter, civil or criminal, done or existing at the time of the taking effect of this act, except as mentioned in the third proviso of section 19 hereof; but as to all such prosecutions, suits, actions, proceedings, acts, things, or matters, the laws or parts of laws repealed or amended by this act are hereby continued in force and effect.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, at the close of the first paragraph of section 9, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, at the end of the first paragraph of section 9, it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That no foreign vessel shall transport or participate in transporting passengers or freight from any port or place in the United States to any port or place in Alaska or from any port or place in Alaska to any port or place in the United States, either directly or by way of a foreign port or place, either for the full or any part of the voyage, or shipment. Any vessel which violates or participates or aids in violating this provision shall be subject to a penalty of $200 for each passenger so transported and the forfeiture of the freight so transported, and any person who engages or aids in the violation of this provision shall be subject to the penalty of this act.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I will take just a moment to explain what this amendment does, and then will let it come to a vote. The law as it now reads is as follows:

No foreign vessel shall transport passengers between ports or places in the United States, either directly or by way of a foreign port, either for the full voyage or any part thereof, under penalty of $200 for each such passenger so transported and landed.

Mr. President, it will be noted that the words are "no foreign vessel shall transport," and so forth. Under the construction of the court, because the word "vessel" is in the singular number, the provision can be evaded; that is, a foreign-built vessel can take a passenger from a port in this country destined to another port in the country to a foreign port and stop there and transfer the passenger to another foreign-built ship, and then carry him on to an American destination.

Now, that is a pure evasion of the law, and it seems to me we ought not to tolerate it.

The situation is just this: Since the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway has been constructed to Prince Rupert the Canadians have an agency in the city of Seattle and are transporting passengers from Seattle to an Alaskan port. They sell a ticket to Prince Rupert by one vessel, and then they sell a ticket from Prince Rupert to the Alaskan port by another vessel, merely changing the passenger from one to the other. The purpose of this amendment is simply to correct that state of affairs and to require the passenger to be carried in an American-built ship.

Unless you want to do away entirely with the coastwise laws, you will adopt this amendment. Unless you want to permit the evasion of those laws, you will adopt this amendment.

I will not take further time in explaining the amendment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the amendment now introduced by the Senator from Washington was considered by the Committee on Commerce. That committee reached the conclusion that it had some merits, but the determination of the exact extent of its merits required a fuller investigation than they were prepared to make in connection with this particular bill. It does not pretend to deal comprehensively with the question of navigation and our relations to other countries. If the court has made any such decision as that indicated by the Senator from Washington—and I am sure it has, or he would not make the statement—it is a matter that must be disposed of at a time when we have up some measure that deals more properly with the question of foreign and coastwise shipping.

The bill we now have under consideration is limited in its scope to the construction of ships and their possible operation. I trust that the possibility of their operation will be a very remote one. We do not believe that the amendment ought to be made a part of this bill, because it may have the effect of protracting this session. If it goes to conference, and it turns out that it opens up a broader question than we are prepared to deal with at this time it may involve further investigation than it seems necessary to make at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order fixing 6.30 o'clock as the hour of adjournment be suspended, so that we may pass this bill before we adjourn. I understand that a short executive session is desired.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator mean that the order shall be suspended simply for the day?

Mr. KERN. Yes; just for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will inquire of the Senator from Florida if there is any provision in this bill requiring that the officers and any part of the crews of these ships shall be American citizens?

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no provision in this bill referring to that matter. It is covered by other laws.

Mr. GALLINGER. So that they could be officered by foreigners, and the crews could be Japanese or Chinese or Lascars, or any other class?

Mr. FLETCHER. It simply refers to the ownership, and specifies that they shall be owned by American citizens. It does not say anything about the crews.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There is a general law on the subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in after line 18 on page 8.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, at the end of line 18, after the word "leased," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That all officers on the vessels herein provided for shall be American citizens, and at least 50 per cent of the crews shall also be American citizens.

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill provides that these vessels under our flag shall be subject to all the laws appertaining to those vessels that are registered, licensed, and enrolled, and there is no need of this sort of special provision as to these vessels.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is the Senator sure that the laws that are now applicable would require these officers to be American citizens?

Mr. FLETCHER. I say to the Senator that there is no need of a special provision like that, because the bill provides that these vessels shall enjoy all the rights and all the privileges of vessels that are duly registered and enrolled and licensed and sailing under the American flag; so that whatever laws appertain now to such vessels as to crews and as to officers will apply to these vessels.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is quite sure of that, is he?

Mr. FLETCHER. Oh, absolutely sure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course it would do no harm to let this amendment go to conference and look into it a little. I have some apprehension about it.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; there is no question. If the Senator will observe the provision on page 8, he will see that it reads as follows:

Every vessel purchased, chartered, or leased from the board shall, unless otherwise authorized by the board, be operated only under such registry or enrollment and license. Such vessels while employed solely as merchant vessels shall be subject to all laws, regulations, and liabilities governing merchant vessels, whether the United States be interested therein as owner, in whole or in part, or hold any mortgage, lien, or other interest therein.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator is right, and I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. President, I want to offer another amendment, to which I call the attention of the Senator from Florida. On page 7, in line 13, it is provided that the vessels, if they are to be transferred by the board, shall be appraised and sold "at public or private sale." I want to insert the word "competitive" before "sale" and after the word "private," so that it will read "private competitive sale."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. What is the amendment of the Senator?

Mr. GALLINGER. Simply to insert the word "competitive" before the word "sale" in line 13, so that they shall be appraised, leased, and sold at public or private competitive sale.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida kindly consented to have the word "competitive" placed in line 13, page 7. I want to ask him if there is any objection to inserting also the words "after due advertisement," so that it will read "competitive sale after due advertisement"?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not like to throw too many restrictions around the board; I should like to give them a little reasonable leeway here; but I do not see any objection to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it is very desirable. I offer that amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator mention where it is to come in?

Mr. GALLINGER. On page 7, line 13, after the words "private competitive sale," I move to insert the words "after due advertisement."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee our Father in heaven that a retrospective glance through the long vistas of the past reveals the steady gain of man toward the higher, nobler civilization, which deepens our faith in Thee and in the overruling of Thy providence, the possibilities in man which inspire to nobler life, which encourage us to look forward to the day when right shall be stronger than might, peace than war, good than evil, when Thy kingdom shall at last come and Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL TUESDAY NEXT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Can the gentleman give us any idea about the business likely to come before the House after the naval bill and the Philippine bill are disposed of?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that I do not anticipate any legislation of importance that would require the presence of a quorum even until the revenue bill comes back from the Senate, and it is my understanding that it will be at least two weeks, and, I believe, more, before that will be returned.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then, in the opinion of the gentleman it will be two weeks before a quorum will be required?

Mr. MANN. I should take it without question that there would be ample time to give notice to Members if anything should arise that would require their presence.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, certainly. I think Members can take two weeks' vacation now if they wish. Of course, some of us will have to remain here to watch the other side. I shall have to stay here to watch the minority leader, and he will have to stay here to watch me, and perhaps with a little help; but others can go home for a vacation of two weeks at least.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have 30 minutes on next Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. Let us settle this matter first. There may not be any next Tuesday. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and when the House adjourns to-day it will adjourn to meet next Tuesday.

Mr. MANN. Which will give the Speaker a chance to make a political speech.

The SPEAKER. Yes; up in Maine. Two of them. [Laughter.]

FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I have a telegram from Mr. HAYES, the gentleman from California, who is a conferee on the bill H. R. 13391, amending the Federal reserve act, stating that he is ill and not able to return to Washington. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, a member of the committee, Mr. EDMUND PLATT, of New York, be substituted in his place.

The SPEAKER. It does not require unanimous consent. The Chair substitutes Mr. PLATT for Mr. HAYES.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] be given indefinite leave of absence, on account of the death of one of his children.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that his colleague, Mr. SINNOTT, be given indefinite leave of absence, on account of the death of one of his children. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LIGHTHOUSE SERVICE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 14338, an act to authorize aids to navigation, for other work in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, is on the Speaker's table. I ask that it be laid before the House and that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 14338) to authorize aids to navigation, for other work in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask to disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. ADAMSON, Mr. SIMS, and Mr. ESCH.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the primary law in our State.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the primary law in Washington. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of placing in the RECORD a statement concerning the use of my frank in distributing a speech of mine in the district of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what kind of a statement is it?

Mr. SIMS. My colleague, Mr. AIKEN, from South Carolina, is a candidate for renomination, and there is a primary contest in his district. Some one who is trying to defeat him is circulating a speech of mine made two years ago on the cotton futures act and is using my frank in doing so. That is what my statement refers to.

Mr. MANN. If somebody is using the gentleman's frank without authority, why does not the Post Office Department stop it?

Mr. SIMS. Perhaps the Post Office Department knows nothing about it.

Mr. MANN. Somebody ought to call their attention to it.

Mr. BUTLER. He ought to go into the criminal court.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman directed the attention of the postal authorities to the fact that his frank is being misused?

Mr. SIMS. I have not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it is incumbent on the gentleman, because the law is absolute that no outsider is authorized to use the gentleman's frank.

Mr. SIMS. I think the gentleman will fully understand the situation when he hears or reads my remarks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think that it is due to himself that he should prevent the wrongful use of his frank?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on next Tuesday, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of the regular business, I may be allowed to address the House for not exceeding 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that on next Tuesday, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he may address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, there are a number of consents for Members to address the House to-day; I suspect more than the time of the House will allow. I had intended to ask unanimous consent that if the House adjourns to-day before these orders are executed they go over until next Tuesday. Would the gentleman from Mississippi be willing to follow then?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I think gentlemen ought to take their chances on a proposition of that kind. I shall not address the House longer than 30 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I will not object to that, but I will make the request afterwards.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that any order permitting Members to address the House to-day which may not be executed by reason of the adjournment of the House before a completion of the orders in order to-day, may go over until next Tuesday, to follow the address of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that gentlemen who have obtained consent to address the House to-day, who may not do so because of adjournment of the House before they have opportunity to address it, may be permitted to follow in their order the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] on Tuesday next. Is there objection?

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if I may be permitted to follow the gentleman from Mississippi for 40 minutes before that is done?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think my request is a reasonable one.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that following that program I may be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, following the program already announced, he be allowed to address the House for not to exceed 40 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, after the other orders for speaking have been completed, the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. SWEET, may be permitted to address the House for not to exceed 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, after the completion of the oratorical program already fixed, the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. SWEET, be permitted to address the House for not to exceed 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, after the disposition of the orders that have already been made, I may be allowed to address the House for one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asks unanimous consent that on Tuesday, after the finishing of the orders already made, he may be permitted to address the House not to exceed one hour. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BOARD OF MANAGERS, NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr, Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 244, for the appointment of four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 244, respecting the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I trust the gentleman from Missouri will not object. This is a unanimous report and carries out what the committee desires. I trust the gentleman will not object. He knows about the difficulty they have had upon the board.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would say that there are many things connected with the management of the soldiers' home and the boards that have been acting and are now acting that ought to be thoroughly discussed by Members of the House, in order that there may be pointed out some things that are happening and have been happening that are not for the best interest of the soldiers in the home, and I would like at least an opportunity to point those out.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will let this go through, and then by unanimous consent speak to the matters he has in mind. I am aware of what has happened, and this is to correct it, not in legislation that would change the status, but to get rid of an undesirable condition upon the board, and appoint one that would be above criticism.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, out of deference to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] I shall not object at this time, but I desire to state to the gentleman from Illinois and to the Members of the House that there ought to be a clear and complete investigation of the various branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers in order that better service, more efficient and more expeditious and honest administration of its affairs may be had.

Mr. CANNON. To which I would have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of H. J. Res. 244. Is there objection?

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas objects.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 17398. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, let the bill be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been reported by the committee?

Mr. GILLETT. It has the unanimous report of the committee; yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS IN NATIONAL PARKS AND FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 4862, and ask that it be laid before the House for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is a similar House bill on the calendar?

Mr. RANDALL. There is a similar House bill on the calendar—H. R. 6814.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS IN NATIONAL PARKS AND FOREST RESERVES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the bill, S. 4862, a similar House bill being on the calendar.

The title was read as follows:

A bill (S. 4862) to exclude intoxicating liquors from national parks and national forest reserves.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he intends to insist on his point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I certainly do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman made the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will withdraw his request, I will not insist on the point.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to withhold it for a moment that I may submit a conference report.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will withdraw the demand for the only purpose of allowing the gentleman to present a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws his point of no quorum.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a conference report on the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 15947), together with the statement, and ask that it remain on the Speaker's table.

Mr. MANN. Let us dispose of it this morning.

Mr. PADGETT. Then I ask unanimous consent to waive the printing under the rule, as it was printed yesterday in the Senate proceedings, and that it be called up at the present and that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair likes to deal fairly with everybody. If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] withdrew his point of order temporarily, the gentleman from Tennessee might present his conference report.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdrew the point of order with qualification.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I renew it.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman withdraw it?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to object to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] for unanimous consent, but I think there was an understanding that the conference report on the Philippine bill should come up first, and I hope the gentleman will not ask that his bill be called up until the report on the Philippine bill has been disposed of.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not wish any conflict with the gentleman from Virginia, but I think we can dispose of this report in about two minutes. His report will require debate, I understand, and mine will not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] asks unanimous consent——

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman can all get in with their conference reports.

Mr. JONES. I will not object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will give me half a minute to state that I will vote against the bill on the final passage if we have a roll call, so that I may get myself right in the RECORD, I will not make any objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has already stated that. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report on the naval appropriation bill without printing it in the RECORD again, inasmuch as it was printed by the Senate yesterday. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the conference report and statement as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House, at the second conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 15947) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and submitted by the accompanying report on the amendments of the Senate, namely:

Amendments Nos. 19, 20, 24, 72, 73, 75, 76, 82, 84. 85, and 174 provide for the expenses in the various bureaus due to the increase of the enlisted personnel agreed to by the House in amendments Nos. 80 and 83, and the House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 201, 202, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, and 237 provide for an increase in the personnel of the Marine Corps, being an increase of 20 per cent of the increase allowed the Navy in amendments 80 and 83 agreed to by the House, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 41 provides for an appropriation of $300,000 for remodeling the old machine shop at the navy yard, Portsmouth, N. H., and the Senate recedes.

Amendments Nos. 51 and 52 provide for the enlarging of the dry dock at the navy yard, Charleston, S. C., to cost $1,085,000, with an appropriation of $750,000. It also provides an appropriation of $200,000 for a foundry and forge shop, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 54 provides an appropriation of $100,000 to extend the wharf 1,650 feet at the naval station, New Orleans, La., and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 69 is a change of total.

Amendment No. 71 strikes out the House provision which provides for a report from a commission as to the necessity, desirability, and advisability of establishing an additional navy yard or naval station on the Atlantic coast south of Cape Hatteras or on or near the United States coast of the Gulf of Mexico or in the Caribbean Sea, and inserts a provision that the commission report as to the necessity, desirability, and advisability of establishing submarine and aviation bases on the Atlantic, Gulf of Mexico, and Pacific coasts, and other possessions of the United States, providing $10,000 to defray the expenses of said commission.

The amendment also makes an appropriation of $500,000 to secure a suitable site on the Columbia River, Oreg., for the construction of a submarine and torpedo-boat base.

The Senate amendment also provides that the commission authorized shall report on the advisability of establishing one or more additional naval academies, and the House recedes with an amendment restoring the matter stricken out by the Senate and provides for a report on the submarine and aviation bases on the Atlantic, Gulf of Mexico, and Pacific coasts with an appropriation of $10,000 to defray the expenses, but strikes out the appropriation of $500,000 for a base on the Columbia River and strikes out the provision requiring a report on the establishment of additional academies.

Amendment No. 241 strikes out the House provision whereby the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to fit up certain navy yards for ship construction in the event that he is unable to secure from the shipbuilders contracts for the expeditious construction of ships at a fair and reasonable price, appropriating the sum of $6,000,000, and inserts a provision which makes it mandatory that the Secretary of the Navy shall equip certain navy yards for ship construction and certain ones shall be equipped for construction of capital ships forthwith.

The Senate amendment also inserts a provision providing that a report be made to Congress at the earliest practicable date giving specific plans for improvement of the harbors and canals and connecting channels which will best provide adequate facilities for operations of the fleet for defense of the harbors on the Atlantic, Gulf of Mexico, and Pacific coasts of the United States; also as to any required extensions of existing projects and the cost thereof.

The Senate also inserted an amendment providing for the protection of the uniform.

The House recedes with an amendment striking out the provisions relating to the protection of the uniform and retains the provision directing a report for specific plans on the improvement of harbors and channels for the operations of the fleet and removes the mandatory provision that navy yards be fitted for ship construction, but authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to improve and equip the navy yards at Puget Sound, Philadelphia, Norfolk, New York, Boston, Portsmouth, Charleston, and New Orleans, with a proviso that the navy yards at Norfolk, Philadelphia, Boston, and Puget Sound may be equipped for the construction of capital ships. The provision agreed upon is not mandatory that the $6,000,000 shall be used for the purposes set forth as was provided in the Senate provision.

The total of the bill as it passed the Senate is $316,818,343.55.

As agreed to by conferees, $313,384,389.24.

A reduction in conference of $3,433,954.31.

THOMAS S. BUTLER,
ERNEST W. ROBERTS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] has asked me to yield three minutes to him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my appreciation to the conferees, and particularly to the chairman of the committee, for the item that appears regarding the equipping of the yards. This is a day of rejoicing on the Pacific coast. We feel that with the provision in there that the equipment of the Puget Sound yard is certain, people on the Pacific now believe that we will have naval vessels constructed on the Pacific, and we will have within a reasonable time battleships upon that ocean so as to protect us and remove the invitation to attack that our weakness now gives. We have never had a battleship squadron on the Pacific Ocean except on a brief holiday visit. The old Oregon is the only battleship that for years has been upon the Pacific. I want publicly to express my thanks to the chairman and the other members of the committee in behalf of the people of the Pacific coast and the entire country. This provision makes certain the future of the Puget Sound yard. It is destined soon to become one of the great navy yards of the world. It shall always be a great satisfaction to me that I have had some part in passing legislation that will cause the Puget Sound yard to be equipped to build even the greatest of naval vessels.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report to the bill H. R. 15947, the naval appropriation bill.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. FLOOD, Mr. FOSS, Mr. CLINE, and Mr. DILL were granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on Senate bill 381, the Philippine bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls up the conference report on the Philippine bill. What request does the gentleman make?

Mr. JONES. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the statement which I send to the Clerk's desk may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman speaks of the statement which he sends to the Clerk's desk. What statement is it?

Mr. JONES. It is the statement of the House conferees as to the changes that have been made.

Mr. MANN. Has not that been printed?

Mr. JONES. It has not been. The report has been printed.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman would have to ask unanimous consent to consider the conference report, then.

Mr. JONES. Then, if that be necessary, Mr. Speaker, and I did not know that it was, I ask unanimous consent to do that; but I understood that the rules applied to the report.

Mr. MANN. The rules apply to both.

Mr. JONES. Then, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the rule about printing a statement accompanying a conference report be waived, and that the report be considered now and the statement read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

"The first election under the provisions of this act shall be held on the first Tuesday of October, 1916, unless the Governor General in his discretion shall fix another date not earlier than 30 nor later than 60 days after the passage of this act: Provided, That the Governor General's proclamation shall be published at least 30 days prior to the date fixed for the election, and there shall be chosen at such election one senator from each senate district for a term of three years and one for six years. Thereafter one senator from each district shall be elected from each senate district for a term of six years: Provided, That the Governor General of the Philippine Islands shall appoint, without the consent of the senate and without restriction as to residence, senators and representatives who will, in his opinion, best represent the senate districts and those representative districts which may be included in the territory not now represented in the Philippine Assembly: Provided further, That thereafter elections shall be held only on such days and under such regulations as to ballots, voting, and qualifications of electors as may be prescribed by the Philippine Legislature, to which is hereby given authority to redistrict the Philippine Islands and modify, amend, or repeal any provision of this section, except such as refer to appointive senators and representatives.

"SEC. 17. That the terms of office of elective senators and representatives shall be six and three years, respectively, and shall begin on the date of their election. In case of vacancy among the elective members of the senate or in the house of representatives special elections may be held in the districts wherein such vacancy occurred under such regulations as may be prescribed by law, but senators or representatives elected in such cases shall hold office only for the unexpired portion of the term wherein the vacancy occurred. Senators and representatives appointed by the Governor General shall hold office until removed by the Governor General.

"SEC. 18. That the senate and house of representatives, respectively, shall be the sole judges of the elections, returns, and qualifications of their elective members, and each house may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel an elective member. Both houses shall convene at the capital on the 16th day of October next following the election and organize by the election of a speaker or a presiding officer, a clerk, and a sergeant at arms for each house, and such other officers and assistants as may be required. A majority of each house shall constitute a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may meet, adjourn from day to day, and compel the attendance of absent members. The legislature shall hold annual sessions, commencing on the 16th day of October, or, if the 16th day of October be a legal holiday, then on the first day following which is not a legal holiday, in each year. The legislature may be called in special session at any time by the Governor General for general legislation, or for action on such specific subjects as he may designate. "No senator or representative shall, during the time for which he may have been elected, be eligible to any office the election to which is vested in the legislature, nor shall be appointed to any office of trust or profit which shall have been created or the emoluments of which shall have been increased during such term.

"SEC. 19. That each house of the legislature shall keep a journal of its proceedings and, from time to time, publish the same; and the yeas and nays of the members of either house, on any question, shall, upon demand of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal, and every bill and joint resolution which shall have passed both houses shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor General. If he approve the same, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it with his objections to that house in which it shall have originated, which shall enter the objections at large on its journal and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of the members elected to that house shall agree to pass the same, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of all the members elected to that house it shall be sent to the Governor General, who, in case he shall then not approve, shall transmit the same to the President of the United States. The vote of each house shall be the yeas and nays, and the names of the members voting for and against shall be entered on the journal. If the President of the United States approve the same, he shall sign it and it shall become a law. If he shall not approve same, he shall return it to the Governor General, so stating, and it shall not become a law: Provided, That if any bill or joint resolution shall not be returned by the Governor General as herein provided within 20 days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him the same shall become a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the legislature by adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall become a law unless vetoed by the Governor General within 30 days after adjournment: Provided further, That the President of the United States shall approve or disapprove an act submitted to him under the provisions of this section within six months from and after its enactment and submission for his approval; and if not approved within such time, it shall become a law the same as if it had been specifically approved. The Governor General shall have the power to veto any particular item or items of an appropriation bill, but the veto shall not affect the item or items to which he does not object. The item or items objected to shall not take effect except in the manner heretofore provided in this section as to bills and joint resolutions returned to the legislature without his approval.

"All laws enacted by the Philippine Legislature shall be reported to the Congress of the United States, which hereby reserves the power and authority to annul the same. If at the termination of any fiscal year the appropriations necessary for the support of government for the ensuing fiscal year shall not have been made, the several sums appropriated in the last appropriation bills for the objects and purposes therein specified, so far as the same may be done, shall be deemed to be reappropriated for the several objects and purposes specified in said last appropriation bill; and until the legislature shall act in such behalf the treasurer shall, when so directed by the Governor General, make the payments necessary for the purposes aforesaid.

"SEC. 20. That at the first meeting of the Philippine Legislature created by this act and triennially thereafter there shall be chosen by the legislature two Resident Commissioners to the United States, who shall hold their office for a term of three years beginning with the fourth day of March following their election, and who shall be entitled to an official recognition as such by all departments upon presentation to the President of a certificate of election by the Governor General of said islands. Each of said Resident Commissioners shall, in addition to the salary and the sum in lieu of mileage now allowed by law, be allowed the same sum for stationery and for the pay of necessary clerk hire as is now allowed to the Members of the House of Representatives of the United States, to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and the franking privilege allowed by law to Members of Congress. No person shall be eligible to election as Resident Commissioner who is not a bona fide elector of said islands and who does not owe allegiance to the United States and who is not more than thirty years of age and who does not read and write the English language. The present two Resident Commissioners shall hold office until the fourth of March, nineteen hundred and seventeen. In case of vacancy in the position of Resident Commissioner caused by resignation or otherwise, the Governor General may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Philippine Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancy; but the Resident Commissioner thus elected shall hold office only for the unexpired portion of the term wherein the vacancy occurred.

"SEC. 21. That the supreme executive power shall be vested in an executive officer, whose official title shall be 'The Governor General of the Philippine Islands.' He shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and hold his office at the pleasure of the President and until his successor is chosen and qualified. The Governor General shall reside in the Philippine Islands during his official incumbency, and maintain his office at the seat of government. He shall, unless otherwise herein provided, appoint, by and with the consent of the Philippine Senate, such officers as may now be appointed by the Governor General, or such as he is authorized by this act to appoint, or whom he may hereafter be authorized by law to appoint; but appointments made while the senate is not in session shall be effective either until disapproval or until the next adjournment of the senate. He shall have general supervision and control of all of the departments and bureaus of the government in the Philippine Islands as far as is not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, and shall be commander in chief of all locally created armed forces and militia. He is hereby vested with the exclusive power to grant pardons and reprieves and remit fines and forfeitures, and may veto any legislation enacted as herein provided. He shall submit within ten days of the opening of each regular session of the Philippine Legislature a budget of receipts and expenditures, which shall be the basis of the annual appropriation bill. He shall commission all officers that he may be authorized to appoint. He shall be responsible for the faithful execution of the laws of the Philippine Islands and of the United States operative within the Philippine Islands, and whenever it becomes necessary he may call upon the commanders of the military and naval forces of the United States in the islands, or summon the posse comitatus, or call out the militia or other locally created armed forces, to prevent or suppress lawless violence, invasion, insurrection, or rebellion; and he may, in case of rebellion or invasion, or imminent danger thereof, when the public safety requires it, suspend the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus, or place the islands, or any part thereof, under martial law: Provided, That whenever the Governor General shall exercise this authority, he shall at once notify the President of the United States thereof, together with the attending facts and circumstances, and the President shall have power to modify or vacate the action of the Governor General. He shall annually and at such other times as he may be required make such official report of the transactions of the government of the Philippine Islands to an executive department of the United States to be designated by the President, and his said annual report shall be transmitted to the Congress of the United States; and he shall perform such additional duties and functions as may in pursuance of law be delegated or assigned to him by the President.

"SEC. 22. That, except as provided otherwise in this act, the executive departments of the Philippine government shall continue as now authorized by law until otherwise provided by the Philippine Legislature. When the Philippine Legislature herein provided shall convene and organize, the Philippine Commission, as such, shall cease and determine, and the members thereof shall vacate their offices as members of said commission: Provided, That the heads of executive departments shall continue to exercise their executive functions until the heads of departments provided by the Philippine Legislature pursuant to the provisions of this act are appointed and qualified. The Philippine Legislature may thereafter by appropriate legislation increase the number or abolish any of the executive departments, or make such changes in the names and duties thereof as it may see fit, and shall provide for the appointment and removal of the heads of the executive departments by the Governor General: Provided, That all executive functions of the government must be directly under the Governor General or within one of the executive departments under the supervision and control of the Governor General. There is hereby established a bureau, to be known as the Bureau of Non-Christian Tribes, which said bureau shall be embraced in one of the executive departments to be designated by the Governor General, and shall have general supervision over the public affairs of the inhabitants of the territory represented in the legislature by appointive senators and representatives.

"SEC. 23. That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, a vice governor of the Philippine Islands, who shall have all of the powers of the Governor General in the case of a vacancy or temporary removal, resignation, or disability of the Governor General, or in case of his temporary absence; and the said vice governor shall be the head of the executive department, known as the department of public instruction, which shall include the bureau of education and the bureau of health, and he may be assigned such other executive duties as the Governor General may designate.

"Other bureaus now included in the department of public instruction shall, until otherwise provided by the Philippine Legislature, be included in the department of the interior.

"The President may designate the head of an executive department of the Philippine government to act as Governor General in the case of a vacancy, the temporary removal, resignation, or disability of the Governor General and of the vice governor, or their temporary absence, and the head of the department thus designated shall exercise all the powers and perform all the duties of the Governor General during such vacancy, disability, or absence.

"SEC. 24. That there shall be appointed by the President an auditor, who shall examine, audit, and settle all accounts pertaining to the revenues and receipts from whatever source of the Philippine government and of the provincial and municipal governments of the Philippines, including trust funds and funds derived from bond issue; and audit, in accordance with law and administrative regulations, all expenditures of funds or property pertaining to or held in trust by the government or the Provinces or municipalities thereof. He shall perform a like duty with respect to all government branches.

"He shall keep the general accounts of the government and preserve the vouchers pertaining thereto.

"It shall be the duty of the auditor to bring to the attention of the proper administrative officer expenditures of funds or property which, in his opinion, are irregular, unnecessary, excessive, or extravagant.

"There shall be a deputy auditor appointed in the same manner as the auditor. The deputy auditor shall sign such official papers as the auditor may designate and perform such other duties as the auditor may prescribe, and in case of the death, resignation, sickness, or other absence of the auditor from his office, from any cause, the deputy auditor shall have charge of such office. In case of the absence from duty, from any cause, of both the auditor and the deputy auditor, the Governor General may designate an assistant, who shall have charge of the office.

"The administrative jurisdiction of the auditor over accounts, whether of funds or property, and all vouchers and records pertaining thereto, shall be exclusive. With the approval of the Governor General he shall from time to time make and promulgate general or special rules and regulations not inconsistent with law covering the method of accounting for public funds and property, and funds and property held in trust by the government or any of its branches: Provided, That any officer accountable for public funds or property may require such additional reports or returns from his subordinates or others as he may deem necessary for his own information and protection.

"The decisions of the auditor shall be final and conclusive upon the executive branches of the government, except that appeal therefrom may be taken by the party aggrieved or the head of the department concerned within one year, in the manner hereinafter prescribed. The auditor shall, except as hereinafter provided, have like authority as that conferred by law upon the several auditors of the United States and the Comptroller of the United States Treasury and is authorized to communicate directly with any person having claims before him for settlement, or with any department, officer, or person having official relations with his office.

"As soon after the close of each fiscal year as the accounts of said year may be examined and adjusted the auditor shall submit to the Governor General and the Secretary of War an annual report of the fiscal concerns of the government, showing the receipts and disbursements of the various departments and bureaus of the government and of the various Provinces and municipalities, and make such other reports as may be required of him by the Governor General or the Secretary of War.

"In the execution of their duties the auditor and the deputy auditor are authorized to summon witnesses, administer oaths, and to take evidence, and, in the pursuance of these provisions, may issue subpœnas and enforce the attendance of witnesses, as now provided by law.

"The office of the auditor shall be under the general supervision of the Governor General and shall consist of the auditor and deputy auditor and such necessary assistants as may be prescribed by law.

"SEC. 25. That any person aggrieved by the action or decision of the auditor in the settlement of his account or claim may, within one year, take an appeal in writing to the Governor General, which appeal shall specifically set forth the particular action of the auditor to which exception is taken, with the reason and authorities relied on for reversing such decision.

"If the Governor General shall confirm the action of the auditor, he shall so indorse the appeal and transmit it to the auditor, and the action shall thereupon be final and conclusive. Should the Governor General fail to sustain the action of the auditor, he shall forthwith transmit his grounds of disapproval to the Secretary of War, together with the appeal and the papers necessary to a proper understanding of the matter. The decision of the Secretary of War in such case shall be final and conclusive.

"SEC. 26. That the supreme court and the courts of first instance of the Philippine Islands shall possess and exercise jurisdiction as heretofore provided and such additional jurisdiction as shall hereafter be prescribed by law. The municipal courts of said islands shall possess and exercise jurisdiction as now provided by law, subject in all matters to such alteration and amendment as may be hereafter enacted by law; and the chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court shall hereafter be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States. The judges of the court of first instance shall be appointed by the Governor General, by and with the advice and consent of the Philippine Senate: Provided, That the admiralty jurisdiction of the supreme court and courts of first instance shall not be changed except by act of Congress. That in all cases pending under the operation of existing laws, both criminal and civil, the jurisdiction shall continue until final judgment and determination.

"SEC. 27. That the Supreme Court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to review, revise, reverse, modify, or affirm the final judgments and decrees of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands in all actions, cases, causes, and proceedings now pending therein or hereafter determined thereby in which the Constitution or any statute, treaty, title, right, or privilege of the United States is involved, or in causes in which the value in controversy exceeds $25,000, or in which the title or possession of real estate exceeding in value the sum of $25,000, to be ascertained by the oath of either party or of other competent witnesses, is involved or brought in question; and such final judgments or decrees may and can be reviewed, revised, reversed, modified, or affirmed by said Supreme Court of the United States on appeal or writ of error by the party aggrieved within the same time, in the same manner, under the same regulations, and by the same procedure, as far as applicable, as the final judgments and decrees of the district courts of the United States.

"SEC. 28. That the government of the Philippine Islands may grant franchises and rights, including the authority to exercise the right of eminent domain, for the construction and operation of works of public utility and service, and may authorize said works to be constructed and maintained over and across the public property of the United States, including streets, highways, squares, and reservations, and over similar property of the government of said islands, and may adopt rules and regulations under which the provincial and municipal governments of the islands may grant the right to use and occupy such public property belonging to said Provinces or municipalities: Provided, That no private property shall be damaged or taken for any purpose under this section without just compensation, and that such authority to take and occupy land shall not authorize the taking, use, or occupation of any land except such as is required for the actual necessary purposes for which the franchise is granted, and that no franchise or right shall be granted to any individual, firm, or corporation except under the conditions that it shall be subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal by the Congress of the United States, and that lands or right of use and occupation of lands thus granted shall revert to the governments by which they were respectively granted upon the termination of the franchises and rights under which they were granted or upon their revocation or repeal. That all franchises or rights granted under this act shall forbid the issue of stock or bonds except in exchange for actual cash or for property at a fair valuation equal to the par value of the stock or bonds so issued; shall forbid the declaring of stock or bond dividends, and, in the case of public-service corporations, shall provide for the effective regulation of the charges thereof, for the official inspection and regulation of the books and accounts of such corporations, and for the payment of a reasonable percentage of gross earnings into the treasury of the Philippine Islands or of the Province or municipality within which such franchises are granted and exercised: Provided further, That it shall be unlawful for any corporation organized under this act, or for any person, company, or corporation receiving any grant, franchise, or concession from the government of said islands, to use, employ, or contract for the labor of persons held in involuntary servitude; and any person, company, or corporation so violating the provisions of this act shall forfeit all charters, grants, or franchises for doing business in said islands, in an action or proceeding brought for that purpose in any court of competent jurisdiction by any officer of the Philippine government, or on the complaint of any citizen of the Philippines, under such regulations and rules as the Philippine Legislature shall prescribe, and in addition shall be deemed guilty of an offense, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000.

"SEC. 29. That, except as in this act otherwise provided, the salaries of all the officials of the Philippines not appointed by the President, including deputies, assistants, and other employees, shall be such and be so paid out of the revenues of the Philippines as shall from time to time be determined by the Philippine Legislature; and if the legislature shall fail to make an appropriation for such salaries, the salaries so fixed shall be paid without the necessity of further appropriations therefor. The salaries of all officers and all expenses of the offices of the various officials of the Philippines appointed as herein provided by the President shall also be paid out of the revenues of the Philippines. The annual salaries of the following-named officials appointed by the President and so to be paid shall be: The Governor General, $18,000; in addition thereto he shall be entitled to the occupancy of the buildings heretofore used by the chief executive of the Philippines, with the furniture and effects therein, free of rental; vice governor, $10,000; chief justice of the supreme court, $8,000; associate justices of the supreme court, $7,500 each; auditor, $6,000; deputy auditor, $3,000.

"SEC. 30. That the provisions of the foregoing section shall not apply to provincial and municipal officials; their salaries and the compensation of their deputies, assistants, and other help, as well as all other expenses incurred by the Provinces and municipalities, shall be paid out of the provincial and municipal revenues in such manner as the Philippine Legislature shall provide.

"SEC. 31. That all laws or parts of laws applicable to the Philippines not in conflict with any of the provisions of this act are hereby continued in force and effect."

And the House agree to the same.

W. A. JONES,
JOE J. RUSSELL,
Managers on the part of the House.
GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK,
JOHN F. SHAFROTH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 381) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, state that the Senate has receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the House Nos. 2, 3, and 4, and agrees to the same.

That the Senate has receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the House No. 1, and agrees to the same with an amendment in the nature of a substitute bill. The result of this agreement is as follows, to wit:

The Senate recedes from its disagreement to the action of the House in striking out section No. 34, known as the Clarke amendment. The Senate also recedes from its disagreement to the action of the House in striking out section No. 1 and substituting therefor all of House bill (H. R. No. 1), as amended and agreed upon in the House Committee on Insular Affairs, and agrees to the same with an amendment in the nature of a substitute bill. And it also recedes from its disagreement to the action of the House in striking out all the sections of the bill from No. 2 to No. 33, inclusive, and agrees to the same. It further recedes from its disagreement to the action of the House in inserting in the bill the preamble to House bill and accepts the same in its entirety.

There are a number of changes made in the bill as amended as aforesaid, as follows:

In section 2, line 14, the words "continuing to reside therein" are omitted. This is done in order to preserve the citizenship of such Filipinos as may be temporarily residing outside of the Philippine Islands at this time.

On page 5 the paragraph of the bill of rights prohibiting the making of laws respecting an establishment of religion, etc., as contained in Senate bill 381 is substituted for that of the House bill upon the same subject.

On page 9, in line 15, the words "immigration or" are inserted before the words "the currency." The effect of this will be to require that all acts of the Philippine Legislature affecting immigration as well as those relating to the currency must receive the approval of the President before they can be passed by the legislature.

On page 12, in section 15, the words "citizen of the Philippines" are stricken out and the words "person who is not a citizen or subject of a foreign power" substituted therefor. This permits citizens of the United States residing in the Philippines to exercise the right of suffrage without losing their American ctizenship.

On page 15, in line 2, the word "a" is stricken out and the words "an elective" substituted in its stead. The effect of this will be to prevent the legislature from expelling appointive senators and representatives.

On page 16, in line 8, the word "Legislature" is substituted for the words "Legislative Assembly."

In section No. 19 it is provided that the Governor General shall have 30 days after the adjournment of the legislature in which to veto bills passed by the legislature.

Section No. 20 is changed so as to make the Resident Commissioners elective by the Philippine Legislature instead of by popular vote.

Section No. 23 provides for the appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, of a vice governor. The Senate bill provided for a vice governor, whilst there was no such provision in the House bill.

In section No. 24 it is provided that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, shall appoint an auditor and a deputy auditor. The Senate bill provided for the appointment of these officials, but there was no such provision in the House bill.

Provision is made in section No. 29 for a salary of $10,000 for the vice governor, $6,000 for the auditor, and $3,000 for the deputy auditor.

These are the only material, if not the only, changes made in the bill which was substituted in the House for the Senate bill.

W. A. JONES,
JOE J. RUSSELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out as briefly as I can the changes which the conferees have made in the Senate bill, as the same was amended in and passed by the House.

Members will recall that the bill which was considered in the House was the Senate bill, and that it was amended in the House in four important particulars. One of those amendments struck out section 34, known as the Clarke amendment, which provided for Philippine independence in not less than two or more than four years.

Another House amendment struck out section 1 of the bill and substituted for it the entire House bill.

The third amendment—I am not stating them in the order in which they were adopted—struck out all the remaining sections of the bill—sections 2 to 33, inclusive.

The fourth amendment was the insertion of the preamble of the House bill.

The Senate has receded from its disagreement to the House amendment striking out section 34, which fixed a definite and an early period for Philippine independence. It has also receded from its disagreement to the action of the House in substituting for the first section the House bill, an amendment in the nature of a substitute bill, which has been printed in the RECORD, and which I desire briefly to explain. It has also receded from its disagreement to the preamble of the House bill.

The bill as agreed upon makes some 10 or 12 changes in the bill as it passed the House, and I will state as briefly as I can what those changes are. In section 2, line 14, the words "continue to reside therein" have been stricken out, so that those Filipinos who happen to be out of the islands when this bill is passed will not be deprived of their citizenship.

The conferees have made a slight change in the provision of the bill of rights prohibiting the appropriation of public money for sectarian purposes, adopting the language of the Senate bill as preferable to that contained in the House bill.

The third change in the House bill is that made on page 9, section 10, and line 15. Before the word "currency" the words "immigration or" are added, so that in addition to currency and coinage laws all measures relating to immigration must receive the approval of the President of the United States before they can be enacted by the Philippine Legislature. The next change is a somewhat important one.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALEXANDER). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman says the legislation must receive the approval of the President before it is enacted. Does the gentleman mean before it can become a law?

Mr. JONES. No. All propositions to change existing laws relating to currency, coinage, or immigration must receive the approval of the President before they are passed by the legislature. That is my recollection. I have not referred to the conference report.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That changes the situation which has existed heretofore. Before a law repealing the present law prohibiting the coming in of Chinese coolies can be enacted the bill must receive the approval of the President of the United States?

Mr. JONES. Yes; that, I think, is true. As it passed the House the bill provided that only bills relating to coinage and currency should receive the prior approval of the President. This report simply places immigration measures on the same footing as those relating to coinage and currency.

On page 12, in section 15, and line 4, the words "citizen of the Philippines" are stricken out and the words "person who is not a citizen or subject of a foreign country" are inserted in their stead. The purpose of this change is to allow Americans who are residents of the islands and who possess the same qualifications as those possessed by natives to vote without relinquishing their American citizenship. The House bill did not permit citizens of the United States to vote in the Philippine Islands. The House conferees yielded this point to the Senate conferees.

so that American citizens resident there may, under this change, vote in the Philippines when otherwise qualified to do so.

Another change will be found on page 15, line 2. The word "a" is stricken out and the words "an elective" substituted therefor. The legislature is only permitted to expel its elective members.

The next change in the text of the bill is to be found in line 8, page 16, where the words "legislative assembly" were inadvertently employed. For those words the word "legislature" has been substituted. Hereafter the body is to be known as the legislature.

On page 17, in line 17, section 9, the words "not be a law" are stricken out, and the words "become a law unless approved by the Governor General within 30 days after adjournment" are substituted in their stead. This change permits the Governor General to veto bills within 30 days after the adjournment of the legislature. It was argued that it would be impossible for the Governor General to examine carefully all the bills that might be presented to him during the last hours of the session of the legislature, and that therefore he would be compelled to either veto or to approve them without giving to them full and careful consideration. A similar provision is to be found in most of the constitutions of our States.

In section 20 of the House bill it is provided that the resident commissioners shall be elected by popular vote. The bill as it is now framed provides that the resident commissioners shall be elected as they are at present; that is, by the legislature and not by popular vote.

Three other important changes are made in the bill. The Senate bill created the position of vice governor, and provided that certain bureaus should be placed under the jurisdiction of that official. The House bill contained no such provision. The Senate provision, with a slight change, has been adopted by the conferees, so that there will be a vice governor to be appointed by the President of the United States, whose department shall embrace the bureaus of education and of health and such others as may be assigned to it by the Governor General.

The Senate bill also provided for the appointment by the President of an auditor and a deputy auditor. The House bill contained no such provision. The conferees on the part of the Senate insisted that it was important that there should be an auditor and a deputy auditor to supervise the accounts of the islands, and the House conferees yielded the point.

The salaries of these three officials are fixed as follows: Ten thousand dollars for the vice governor, $6,000 for the auditor, and $3,000 for the deputy auditor.

I think these are about all, if, indeed, not all, the changes that have been made by the conferees in the bill as it passed the House.

I do not care to say anything more upon this subject, unless some gentleman desires to ask me a question.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not had the opportunity to read the conference report, but from reading a newspaper statement I gained the understanding that an American citizen, in order to vote in the Philippine Islands, must become a citizen of those islands. Is that true; and if so, just what does it mean, and how does it affect his American citizenship, if at all?

Mr. JONES. The bill as it passed the House provided that citizenship should be confined to natives of the islands. Other persons, citizens of the United States and of foreign countries, must have been naturalized in order to become voters in the islands. The bill as agreed upon in conference permits Americans to become voters without their being required to relinquish their American citizenship.

Mr. MONDELL. Without their status as American citizens being affected in any way at all?

Mr. JONES. Without affecting their status as American citizens in any respect or degree.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular? As I understand it, American citizens residing in the islands must comply with the naturalization requirements of the Philippine Legislature in order to permit them to vote.

Mr. JONES. No; not with any naturalization requirements, but with the registration requirements. They must have resided for one year in the islands, just as a native must have resided there a year, and must possess the requisite educational or property qualifications. The qualifications which Americans must possess are precisely those required of natives; and when an American citizen exercises the right of suffrage in the Philippines, he will not thereby lose his American citizenship.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly direct my attention to that paragraph? As I recall it from reading it last evening I gained the impression that American citizens would not be privileged to vote unless they complied with the requirements of the Philippine Legislature as to naturalization.

Mr. JONES. I read some such statement in a Washington paper this morning. The fact is just the contrary.

Mr. STAFFORD. I read the report last night, and gained my impression from it. I did not gain my impression from the newspapers.

Mr. JONES. The contrary is absolutely the fact. I will read the language of the report to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. What section?

Mr. JONES. Section 15, line 12, page 12. As the bill passed the House it read thus:

Every male citizen of the Philippine Islands 21 years of age—

And so forth. The conferees have stricken out the words "citizen of the Philippines," and have inserted language which makes is read thus:

Every male person who is not a citizen or subject of a foreign power.

Citizens of the United States are not citizens or subjects of a foreign power. The very purpose of that change was to enable American citizens to vote in the Philippine Islands upon precisely the same terms and under the same conditions that natives are permitted to exercise the right of suffrage.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then they still retain their citizenship of the United States and do not become citizens of the Philippines, but electors, if they can qualify under the provisions of section 15?

Mr. JONES. That is true; and the published statements were entirely incorrect.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Can a qualified voter in the Philippines be elected to office there and be a member of the legislature?

Mr. JONES. He can.

Mr. CANNON. Qualified voters there are citizens for the purposes of holding office?

Mr. JONES. Yes; and I may add that such is now the practice in the islands, although there has been question as to its legality. Americans now vote there, and a number of them have been actually elected to office. This permits that condition to continue.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman kindly direct my attention to the paragraph and page of the report which deals with the matter that he has just been discussing?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is on page 5 of the report.

Mr. JONES. I have not the report before me. It is section 15, however, of the bill as it passed the House. I will say to my colleague on the committee that Senator LIPPITT, the minority conferee on the part of the Senate, suggested this change in the bill, and the suggestion was concurred in by the other conferees.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am quite confident that that was not the first time——

Mr. JONES. The gentleman well knows that originally I was opposed to it. I never did believe it was right that an American citizen should be permitted to vote in the Philippine Islands and then return to and vote in this country. I have, however, in a spirit of compromise, since it is not a matter of practical importance, conceded this point to my brother conferees.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman think an American citizen should have no rights in the Philippines?

Mr. JONES. I think no one—not even an American citizen—should be permitted to vote in the Philippines and then return here and vote at the next election.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. He can not do that, never could, and never will. The gentleman knows that full well.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. FESS. As I listened to the statement the bill is really the House bill with the preamble in it and with this citizenship feature modified and with the auditor item added, and also the vice governor?

Mr. JONES. Yes; with two or three other changes which I have mentioned; and I will say to my friend that nearly all of them are provisions which were contained in the Senate bill and which the House conferees accepted.

Mr. FESS. But hardly any of them are fundamental.

Mr. JONES. I think most of the amendments had the gentleman's approval, and none was fundamental.

And now, Mr. Speaker, having briefly outlined those features in which the conference report differs from the bill as it passed the House, I crave the further indulgence of this membership for a brief moment, in order that I may give expression to a few thoughts that are uppermost in my mind as we approach the final stage in the passage of this measure of such tremendous import to the Philippine people.

First of all permit me to congratulate that people upon what is soon to become the realization of their most cherished hopes and highest aspirations. When the President of the United States affixes his signature to this already too-long-delayed measure of justice and right, it will mark an epoch in the history of this Nation as well as in that of the Philippine Islands, for the pages of the annals of the world will be searched in vain for its counterpart. For it not only bestows upon the Philippine people a measure of self-government such as they have never enjoyed under the sovereignty of this or any other nation, but it establishes what to them is dearer than all else—the everlasting covenant of a great and generous people, speaking through their accredited representatives, that they shall in due time enjoy the incomparable blessings of liberty and freedom.

As is well known, I have always favored fixing a definite date for Philippine independence. For this reason I accepted the provision of the Senate bill known as the Clarke amendment, which gave independence to the Filipinos in not less than two nor more than four years. In the Sixty-second Congress I introduced a bill granting to them independence on the 4th day of July, 1921. Had that bill been enacted into law the Filipinos would have been given eight years in which to establish a government of their own, which I then thought, and still believe, was entirely ample. I confess that I entertained misgivings as to whether the period as fixed by the Senate bill was sufficient to enable the Philippine people to establish an independent government, but so anxious was I that a fixed and definite date should be adopted that I resolved those doubts in favor of the Senate proposition. I am not prepared to say that the rejection of that proposition was not, after all, an act of wisdom. Two, or even four, years constitute a brief period in which to inaugurate a free, representative government for 10,000,000 people. Especially may this be said of a people, however intelligent and patriotic they may be, who have never been permitted to fully exercise the arts of self-government. This bill, as it has been finally agreed upon, confers the fullest opportunity for the establishment of a stable government; and when, in good time, that government shall have been established the solemn assurance is given that complete independence shall follow.

It virtually places it in the power of the Philippine people to say when they shall receive the full substance of self rule and independence. That they can and will establish a stable government upon a firm and enduring basis I have never permitted myself to doubt; and they may confidently rely upon the plighted word and good faith of the American people that when these conditions are met they will be given complete independence. For these reasons I entertain the hope—indeed, I firmly believe—that the provisions of this bill which relate to the future political status of the Philippine Islands will meet the approval of a vast majority if not of all of their educated and thinking people. It is because of my abiding faith in their intelligence and patriotism that, for one, I am willing to commit their destinies into their own hands and keeping.

The governmental features of this bill will work many important changes in the organic law of the Philippines. Without materially altering the structure of the present government, it practically confers all legislative power upon that people, thus giving to them the control of their domestic affairs in all essential particulars.

To particularize, it establishes a legislative body, both branches of which are to be elective.

It abolishes an appointive Philippine Commission, exercising both executive and legislative power and clothed with extraordinary and even autocratic authority. It is safe to affirm that to the arbitrary action of this anomalous body is to be attributed, more than to all other causes, the dissatisfaction at American control which has so long existed in the Philippines.

It confers upon an elective senate the right of confirmation of the appointees of the Governor General.

A disturbing element in the administration of the affairs of the Philippines has ever been the manner in which the lands of the public domain have been administered. Under this bill there will be an end to the exploitation of the public domain.

The bill enlarges and liberalizes the educational qualifications for voting by extending the elective franchise to those who possess the ability to read and write any native language. This will confer the inestimable privilege of participating in their political affairs upon hundreds of thousands of Filipinos who are now arbitrarily and unjustly denied that sacred right.

I shall not attempt further to enumerate the changes that are wrought by this measure in the present organic law of the Philippines. These, in my judgment, fully establish its claim to the support of every Member of this House.

Mr. Speaker, I have already trespassed further upon the attention of the House than I had intended to do. The intent and purpose of this legislation is, as is declared in the preamble, to place in the hands of the people of the Philippines as large a control of their domestic affairs as is consistent with the exercise of American sovereignty so long as that sovereignty shall exist. In my judgment, this will have been accomplished when the President affixes his signature to this bill.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, a word, perhaps, ought to be said on behalf of the minority, considering the fact that the minority members of the conference committee, both of the Senate and the House, did not sign the conference report. I will state to the House that the only reason why that was not done was because of the preamble to the bill. As Members well understand, the preamble of the House bill is still retained in the bill as presented by the conference report. As we judge it, that preamble is purely a political matter, a restatement in terms of the Democratic platform in regard to their intention as to the Philippine Islands. The minority members of the committee believe that, in the first place, a bill of this character ought not to contain any preamble, and, second, that the preamble as stated is not a statement of their belief, at least as to what should be done with the Philippine Islands. Regarding that matter, it is sufficient to say that it has been discussed already and it is not necessary now to go any further into the matter.

The changes which have been made in the bill, however, were approved by the minority members of the conference committee. In fact, practically all of them were suggested by the minority members. Let me call attention, very briefly, to the principal features of these amendments. The first one is that under the amendment reported that has been agreed to by the conference committee immigration now is not subject exclusively to the control of the Philippine Legislature. A bill regarding immigration may be passed by the Philippine Legislature, but it can not become a law except by obtaining the signature of the President of the United States.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understood the gentleman from Virginia to say practically the opposite—that the Legislature of the Philippines could not enact a law in the first instance relating to immigration without first receiving the approval of the President of the United States.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not so understand the provision of the law.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is right. I should have said that no legislation relating to immigration can become effective until it receives the approval of the President.

Mr. TOWNER. In any event it is subject to the approval of the President. Whether the President approves it before or after is immaterial, because it reaches the same result.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I think there is a difference. If the President in the latter way vetoes a bill, it falls by force of his veto, while in this case he vetoes it before the law is passed, which is rather a new phase of legislation.

Mr. TOWNER. I think not. The gentlemen perhaps misunderstand each other rather than the real purpose and method of the law. In this case it is not a veto. It can not become a law affirmatively until it receives the approval of the President of the United States. Ordinarily a law passed by the Philippine Legislature becomes a law unless it is vetoed, but under this provision no law can be enacted by the Philippine Legislature unless it receives the approval of the President of the United States. That makes the President of the United States one party to the legislation in fact, instead of under the ordinary executive rule where it is subject to his veto.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I understand that the minority conferees did not agree to that preamble?

Mr. TOWNER. We did not.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will not a vote for the conference report be a vote for the preamble?

Mr. TOWNER. I presume so; but perhaps the good in the conference report will outweigh the bad in the preamble.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not think anything can outweigh the preamble, and I shall vote against it.

Mr. JONES. I want to say that some Members of the majority did not vote for some things in the report.

Mr. TOWNER. The next Senate amendment is in regard to the first election. The provisions of the bill extend the electorate very much indeed. Under the present law about 275,000 persons in the Philippine Islands are authorized to vote. Under the provisions of the law as it will be changed the electorate will be enlarged, as is estimated, to between 800,000 and 900,000 voters. In other words, it will be increased threefold. The Senate amendment allows the change to be made but does not allow the first election held under the new constitution to be by the enlarged electorate but by the electorate as it now is. For obvious reasons it was deemed unwise that a new electorate, a largely—in fact, tremendously—increased electorate, ought not to take part in an election which must be held in so very short a time. The third amendment is as to the appointment by the President of a vice governor.

This is a very important provision and places the control of the bureaus of education and health directly under the vice governor, who is appointed by the President of the United States. Again, for obvious reasons, it must appear that this is a wise provision.

The next important provision is that the residents in the islands are given the right to vote. I do not need to speak further with regard to that. The matter has been already discussed, and gentlemen can obtain an intelligent view with regard to it.

The fifth important amendment provides for the appointment of an auditor and vice auditor by the President of the United States. This was regarded by many of us as a very important matter. All of the accounts of the Philippine government and of the provincial and municipal governments must be examined, audited, and approved by this auditor and his staff—a very important provision, as I think you all must admit, under the circumstances. I may say that in talking to some residents of the islands they themselves very strongly approve of this legislation and provision.

Let it be said that there was no division of opinion generally between the minority and the majority Members regarding the making up of the bill. There are, of course, many of the provisions of the bill still which I do not approve, and doubtless there is no Member, looking over all of the provisions of the bill, who could not find some provision in it which did not fully reach his approval. However, I think it may be said to both sides of the House that there never has been given to any people—to our own Territories—or yet to be found in the States, a more advanced, a fairer, a more just provision of government and form of government than is given under the present act to the Philippines. In a general way it has my unqualified approval. I think that it is an act that will redound to the credit of the Congress that gives it to the Philippine Islands. I think that it is an act that will bring to the Philippine Islands both enlarged opportunities and a wider field for every branch of progress and development than they have before experienced. I think it will very largely settle a great many of the puzzling and embarrassing questions that have arisen in the islands. I think it will divert the attention of the people of the Philippine Islands from politics to business. I think it will give them a larger measure of prosperity and hope than they have ever had in the past. [Applause.]

BILLS OF LADING.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I now yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia yields one minute to me in order that I may ask the Speaker to lay before the House a request to the Senate respecting the bill-of-lading bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALEXANDER). The Chair lays before the House a request of the Senate, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
August 16, 1916.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the message disagreeing to the amendments and requesting a conference on the bill (S. 19) entitled "An act relating to bills of lading in interstate and foreign commerce"; also all papers accompanying said message.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senate will be granted.

There was no objection.

THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I consumed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Seventeen minutes remain.

Mr. JONES. Seventeen minutes including the time which I yielded? I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. JONES. I do not think anyone on this side desires to speak. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] desires some time, as I understand it.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Do I understand that 17 minutes alone remain or that 17 minutes have been consumed? I understood the Chair to state that 17 minutes remained.

Mr. JONES. No; 17 minutes have been used.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Oh, no; there are only 17 minutes remaining of the hour.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Virginia himself consumed half an hour.

Mr. JONES. Then I can not yield the gentleman from the Philippines 15 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think he ought to have it.

Mr. JONES. I will give notice now that after the gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON] has spoken I shall ask that the time be extended so as to give the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] whatever time he desires and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] five minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to have 10 minutes, though I do not suppose that I shall use that time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota desires 15 or 20 minutes; I would like 10 or 15 minutes, and the gentleman from Wisconsin desires 15 minutes, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] 5 minutes.

Mr. JONES. Then, Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON], and I am going to request that after he concludes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] have 15 minutes, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] 15 minutes, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] 5 minutes, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] 10 minutes, and I make that request now.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. And I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. JONES. And the gentleman from Indiana five minutes and the gentleman from Ohio five minutes. I make that request now, I to have one minute in which to conclude, in which to move the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that his time be extended, that the gentleman from the Philippine Islands be recognized for 15 minutes, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] for 10 minutes, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] for 15 minutes, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] 5 minutes, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BRUMBAUGH] for 5 minutes, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] for 5 minutes, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for 15 minutes, and that the gentleman from Virginia have 1 minute at the conclusion of that time, debate then to close. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman couple with that request also that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON].

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Speaker, the bill which is now before you is practically the same as that which passed the House of Representatives on May 1 last, commonly known as the Jones bill. Therefore I feel justified in predicting that the conference report will be adopted. The long, continuous, hard, and sometimes very bitter contest to enact this legislation shall thus have come to a successful end, and every friend of human liberty will have reason to rejoice. [Applause.]

This bill differs from the bill which passed the Senate of the United States on February 4, 1916, in two respects. On the subject of independence the Senate bill was more definite than this bill, since the Senate bill provided not only that the Philippines shall be granted independence, but it also set the period within which that independence was to be granted; that is, from two to four years. The bill as agreed upon and reported to the House by the conferees does not undertake to determine either the date or the period when independence shall be granted, but it does declare it to be the purpose of the people of the United States to grant the Philippines their independence "as soon as a stable government can be established" in the islands.

With regard to the provisions affecting the powers of the Philippine government and its control by the Filipino people, this bill is more liberal and more logical than the Senate bill. I stood by and fought for the independence clause of the Senate bill, namely, the Clarke amendment, as it is well known to you, but I am fair enough to see and frank enough to say that, even in its present form, this bill is a remarkable progress in the right direction.

For more than three centuries the people of the Philippines were under the rule of Spain. During that long period of time they were held by the Spanish Government avowedly as subjects and were given no part in the government of their country. The laws of the realm defined as treason, punishable even by death, any attempt to free the islands though it be by peaceful means. Eighteen years ago the sovereignty of Spain was succeeded by that of the United States. During this whole time, excepting only the last three years, the Philippine government was practically, almost exclusively, in the hands of American officials appointed by the President. The policy of the United States was undefined. No one knew whether we shall be permanently held as possessions, sold to some other power, or eventually granted independence.

Thank God, those conditions which were becoming every day more and more intolerable will soon disappear, never to return. [Applause.]

Now, we have a legislative declaration that it is the purpose of the people of the United States to grant the Philippines independence as soon as a stable government can be established in the islands. To us these are no empty words—they are the solemn pledge of a great people. [Applause.] And for the speedy accomplishment of said purpose the Filipino people are intrusted with greater legislative power and more administrative control over their domestic affairs. We may now look to a future roseate with hope. The dark clouds of uncertainty have been dispelled from our horizon. Heretofore we have been the least and the last factor in Philippine affairs. Hereafter we shall be the first and most important factor. Heretofore things were done by the Philippine government not only without the consent but on many occasions against the strong opposition of the Filipino people. Hereafter nothing will be done without our consent, much less in defiance of our opposition. So I say, Mr. Speaker, this bill is a long and very decisive step toward the complete emancipation of the Filipino people. It marks an epoch in our national history. [Applause.] We are convinced that the promise of independence contained in the bill will be faithfully fulfilled, for we know that we are dealing with a Nation in the truest sense jealous of its honor and its good name. [Applause.] We are positive that when we have fully demonstrated that we can establish and maintain a government that will protect from lawlessness and from violence its own citizens as well as those of other countries who live or sojourn in the islands, the American people will consent to the setting up of a Philippine republic which will be a glory to the United States and a blessing to us. [Applause.]

Yes, the enactment of such a great piece of constructive legislation as this is to the everlasting credit of this Congress and this administration. You have done a noble work and you have every reason to feel satisfied with and proud of it. You can be sure that when a future Congress cuts forever the tie that as yet binds my country to yours, the Filipino people will not forget that it is because of this legislation that there will then have been brought about such a happy and righteous consummation of your Philippine enterprise. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I know I am voicing the unanimous sentiment of my people when from the bottom of my heart I say to you here to-day we are grateful—profoundly grateful—to the American people, to the Congress of the United States, and to President Wilson for this measure.

Mr. Speaker, may I not be permitted, on this occasion, to transgress the rules of the House so that I may address personally the gentleman from Virginia and say to him: Mr. JONES, I have witnessed your untiring work on this bill; I have seen your unselfish devotion to the cause of Philippine independence, honestly believing that it was demanded not only by God's own law, but also by the best interests of both your country and mine. As the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, which is in charge of legislation affecting the Philippines, you have considered it to be your paramount duty to write into law the covenant of your fathers, and the spirit of America—freedom for all. By this bill, which is the result of your hard labor—labor you have carried out at the risk of your own life, for you have been working in spite of ill-health—you are entitled, in my estimation, to a prominent place in the list of the advocates of human liberty. Surely your name will be written in letters of gold in the history of the Philippine Islands. You have earned not only the eternal gratitude but the love of every individual Filipino. God bless you! [Loud applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, just one word more of a personal character. Seven years ago next December I first entered the Hall of the House of Representatives as the spokesman of the Filipino people. I came with a mandate to work for the immediate independence of the Philippine Islands. Ever since that day, to the best of my ability, I have done everything I could to carry out that mandate. [Applause.] To my knowledge I have been loyal to the will of my people, and no opportunity have I let go by unused that could be employed to promote their welfare as I saw it. True, I have not secured their independence; but I shall feel, once this legislation is enacted, that I have not come to this country in vain. No one advocating certain legislation ever gets all he wants in the first attempt. Considering the time I have been here, the character of the subject, and the influences I had to fight, I feel inclined to say that I am almost surprised that I have secured as much.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not desire to take the gentleman's time. I think it may perhaps be fitting for a Member of the minority to say that while he has not always been able to agree with the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands, he is ready to say that he has never known any man more devoted to the interests of his people, as he understood those interests, than has been the gentleman from the Philippine Islands. [Applause.] In season and out of season, with an ability and persistence rare and creditable to any representative in any parliament in the world, this gentleman has worked for his people.

And I desire to say that, so far as my belief is concerned, there never has been in any legislative body a representative of a people such as the Filipinos who has represented them more ably and faithfully than has the gentleman who now addresses the House [Mr. QUEZON]. [Applause.]

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Iowa for his very kind words, which I sincerely appreciate.

Mr. Speaker, in the course of the campaign I have carried on to present before the American people the real aspirations of my country, I have been at times bitterly assailed and even slandered by persons who are too blind or too partisan to admit that anything but selfish motives can animate their opponents. An earnest determination on the part of some of these to destroy me, politically, and even to ruin my reputation as an honest man failed through no fault of theirs. I have never retorted in kind. The cause I advocate is too just, too sacred for me to permit it to be stained by base or merely personal animadversions. That I was only "trying to perpetuate myself in this job" in advocating independence was the least charge made against me. Well, Mr. Speaker, now the opportunity presents itself of answering that charge, which up to this moment I have ignored, because I always prefer to answer with deeds rather than with words. [Applause.] I could not very well quit my post while nothing was done by this Government to ameliorate conditions in the islands. After having started the fight, it would have seemed lack of determination or cowardice on my part to stop it or to back down. But now that a decisive battle has been won and the further work to be done is comparatively easier, I am going to show how attached I am to my office and how fearful I am of losing it. I shall not seek reelection. I do not want this or any other public office. I can manage to live, and much more to my liking, as a private citizen. The only reason why I sought this place is because I wanted to be of service to my country, not because of the honor or the salary attaching to it. Once I served my country when there was nothing but hunger, fatigue, every kind of hardships, and danger to my life in the service.

Mr. Speaker, my people have been too generous with me. I owe them more than I shall ever be able to repay, no matter what I might have done or might do in the future for them. In leaving my present office I do not propose to abandon my duty of cooperating in the work still to be done until the islands are completely free. I am only going to occupy that place where, in my opinion, I can more effectively help, which, for the present, at least, seems to me to be that of a private citizen.

Just a few parting words, and I shall be through. My service in this House, Mr. Speaker, has been the most valuable experience in my life. Here I have met men great in mind and in heart. I have formed here friendships that I treasure as beyond price. From everyone of you I have received the most courteous treatment. The days I spent among you will always be very dear to me. I thank you, Mr. Speaker; I thank the leader of the majority, the leader of the minority, and each one of the Members of this great House, for you all have been extremely good to me. I want you all to know that I realize that each one of you, no matter how you vote on the Philippine question, is moved only by your earnest desire to do what you think is best for us. And so when I go home I shall tell my people that they have no better friends than they possess in every Member of this body. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUEZON. I hope you will all come to the Philippines and visit me. [Prolonged applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am sure we are agreed that if the passage of this bill means the termination of the services in this House of the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands, Señor QUEZON, we will sincerely regret that the bill is passed, no matter how ardently some of us may be for it. I am especially pleased that the minority ranking member of our committee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] saw fit to pay that well-earned and splendid tribute to the Representative of the Philippine people here in Congress. I indorse all that the gentleman from Iowa said, and it has my hearty and unstinted approval. Señor QUEZON has achieved notable distinction. He is to-day easily the most popular and beloved Filipino among his own people. He has won this splendid place in the hearts of his countrymen by his unfailing devotion to the Filipino's interests as he understands them, by his honesty, his loyalty to principle, by his generous nature and those qualities of personal charm which make him the friend and comrade as well as the leader and statesman. These same qualities have endeared him to us here and enabled him to perform the great work for his cause which, in my opinion, no other living Filipino could so ably carry on. He has achieved success, in that to-day sees the passage of the bill for which he has so long labored. He should be happy to-day—happy in his success, happy in the knowledge that while attaining it he has won the esteem and admiration of the entire membership of this House.

We have before us a conference report on the measure that has been pending for a long time, in one way or another, in this House. There is no serious opposition, as you are well aware, being made to the adoption of this conference report, notwithstanding there are in it some things that are objectionable to some of us.

Personally, I do not think it wise to adopt the preamble that has been agreed upon. [Applause on the Republican side.] I do not think it is wise, for the reason that I do not think it is a concrete and fair statement of anything but a political platform, poorly and inaptly drawn for partisan purposes in the United States. I do not think it is fair to the Filipino people, in that it places them now in an unenviable light. I do not think it is fair to the people of the United States, because the fulfillment of this one test should never be the sole factor to determining the independence question. There are other considerations vital to the people of this country and vital to the Filipino people which should be considered. I think it is indefensible, furthermore, because it is poor policy, even if it is the intention of the people of the United States at some time to grant independence to the people of the Philippine Islands—and we can well imagine, perhaps, that this is their intention; it is indefensible and poor policy because it is exceedingly unwise now to say what we are going to do some time in the future without any knowledge now of what conditions may prevail in the future. [Applause on the Republican side.] Thus to declare is the poorest kind of statesmanship and fails to give any consideration to the welfare of the United States. We are altruists toward the Filipinos, it is true, and we should be, but at the same time we should give thoughtful consideration to the welfare of our own country.

There are some provisions in the body of the bill that are not entirely acceptable to me, and yet the main fundamental provisions in the bill meet with my hearty approval. [Applause on the Republican side.]

When I came back from the Philippine Islands three years ago, after making a complete journey throughout the Provinces, including the non-Christian as well as the Christian regions, I advocated here first publicly that there be given to the people of the Philippine Islands an elective senate as well as an elective house. That is the one fundamental feature in this bill. Around that are grouped sundry provisions to carry out this purpose, provisions which are more or less satisfactory. Perhaps they will prove to be more satisfactory in the working than I now anticipate, but some of them are certain to cause trouble and may jeopardize the whole program.

But I am willing to give the bill a full, fair, and generous trial, aiding in every possible way the success of the enterprise.

A great hour is at hand for the Filipinos, if they are awake to their real interests and welfare. The passage of this bill should end the political activity in the islands, and in its place should spring up a determined effort to develop the resources, increase the wealth of the islands, and promote the well-being of the people. In this hour great statesmen are needed among the Filipino people. Until recent years population in the Philippines had been practically at a standstill for 200 years.

Population in Japan has multiplied, greatly increased in China, and grown much larger in Polynesia generally. The Filipinos have been at a standstill, because of frequently recurring pestilences, and especially because of inadequate food supply of a varied character. Sanitation in the islands has now removed malignant diseases, and the schools are teaching varied and increased food supply.

But the agricultural processes in the islands need revolutionizing, and industries need to be developed. The Philippines furnish a wonderful arena for a new life. These islands are richer in natural resources and capable of supporting a more numerous people than any other equal area on the globe. The area of the Philippines is not quite that of Japan, but they have a much larger area capable of cultivation. In fact, Japan can cultivate only 13 per cent of her area, while in the Philippines fully 40 per cent is capable of cultivation. But one-half the area to-day is in the hands of the wild races. The Philippines have about 8,000,000 people, Japan 54,000,000, and yet the Philippines are capable of sustaining a larger population than Japan. There is no reason why the Philippines, with their resources reasonably developed, can not support a population of 75,000,000.

It is not my intention, however, to enter into any discussion particularly of the provisions of the conference report and bill. Rather I would like in the few minutes at my disposal to direct the attention of the Members of the House to a situation in the Orient which should be opened to the eyes of the American people. He who says that our interests stop with the Pacific coast of our continent knows not his Nation's history and knows not his Nation's purpose and knows not his Nation's future. [Applause on the Republican side.] The Pacific Ocean in the future is destined to be the greatest highway of commerce in the world. The nations of antiquity that rose to prominence and greatness were grouped about the Mediterranean, and why? The Mediterranean was the great highway of the commerce of the world. Some centuries later civilization extended and new countries came into being. The world had become larger, and we find the north Atlantic the great arena of the world's commerce.

In the centuries yet to come we will find that the north Pacific Ocean has become the greatest highway of commerce in the world. About its shores to-day lie more than one-half, almost two-thirds, of the human race. Slumbering millions are awaking to action and to growth. Resources measureless in extent soon will be seeking the markets of the world. The Panama Canal will make the Pacific. It brings London nearer Hongkong and Shanghai than she now is by way of Suez. Bremen and Hamburg and Barcelona, as well as eastern United States and all of South America, are in touch with the Orient across the Pacific. We as Americans came from Europe. Somehow we are prone to look back to the place from which we came, even though the Eldorado may lie to the westward and beyond.

I ask you, my friends, to look beyond the Rockies, beyond the Pacific coast, beyond the seas, to the Orient. There lies America's great future. We have interests in the Orient. We had them before the Spanish-American War. We have them now greater than ever before.

We should not be unmindful in this connection of the fact that gigantic deeds are being performed in the Orient. A militant, thoroughly organized, efficient, strong, virile nation is bent on conquest. The conquest is directed at the present hour toward the continent of Asia, and we see the spectacle of 55,000,000 of these people holding practically in subjection 425,000,000 of another land and another race. The heavy hand of the conqueror rests upon the neck of the meek and gentle Chinaman. As the lion leaps upon the ox, so Japan has leaped upon China.

In this subjection that is already almost accomplished America has some interest. It is not, however, my purpose to enter into any detailed discussion of that now. The Philippine Islands, when we took them 18 years ago, were thought by the American people to be isolated and away off in a remote section of the globe, among the South Sea Islands, where only pirates roved and only naked people dwelt. We knew nothing of the people. We knew nothing of their numbers. We knew nothing of their civilization; we knew nothing of the possibilities of their country. My good friends, in the 18 years that have passed such momentous changes have occurred that the Philippine Islands, to anyone whose eyes are opened, no longer are out of the way, but are directly in the center of the great events transpiring in the Orient. They are the gateway to China, India, and the southern Polynesian group for all of North and South America and all of Europe coming through the Panama Canal. And do not for a moment think that they are unimportant. It was proposed not long ago in this body that we should suddenly withdraw our sovereignty and leave those islands to drift for themselves. Perhaps we thought we had a right to do it and that we could do it, regardless of the effect upon the people of the islands, regardless of the effect upon ourselves. But, my good friends, in my opinion we can not withdraw our sovereignty from the Philippine Islands now, even if we would. Other peoples and other nations are interested in the Orient, and they are interested by reason of the conditions now existing in the world—that at least for a time and a considerable time American sovereignty shall remain in the Philippine Islands.

A gentleman of Holland, Herr Colijn, one of her greatest statesmen, and one who perhaps has had most to do of all her men with the late development in the Dutch East Indies, recently said:

> If your Congress passes the Jones bill with the Clarke amendment, giving independence to the Philippines in 1921, there will certainly be most serious consequences, not only in the Philippines but all over the Orient in the possession of European powers. I ought to say rather that there would be most serious consequences, for I do not believe that you will grant independence to the Philippines, now or soon. You can not. At the very least there must be some arrangement such as the British have in Egypt, where with a nominal native government you would have American supervision and American officials in the higher posts. If the Jones bill is passed you would have to come back to some such system after the Philippines had enjoyed a very short period of complete independence. You would have to do it for the sake of the islands themselves; but in the interval there would be disorders. If the Americans had cast aside their last hold on the islands some other power could step in under pretense of restoring order, and what could you do?

And he knew the power that he meant by "some other power," the only power in the world in whose journals and periodicals during the last eight months can be found words praising the proposal of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty from the islands. They are awake to conditions over there that means much to many of the peoples of the world.

The Dutch East Indies have long occupied an important part in the history of the human race. In 1292 Marco Polo first visited them and brought back to civilization marvelous tales of their wonderful fertility, their measureless wealth, the jewels that were to be found there, and the spices that were to be had. It was because the civilized powers of Europe were determined upon seeking a western passage to these islands that the discovery of America occurred. However, the Portuguese were the first to visit the Dutch East Indies, in 1525. Almost at the time when our Pilgrim Fathers were begging the waves to be still that the Speedwell and the Mayflower might reach this promised land ships were speeding around the other way of the globe from Holland seeking the Dutch East Indies, and they found them. In 1616 began their development in that area.

Holland has an area of about 12,000 square miles. It has a population of 5,000,000. The Dutch East Indies to-day contain an area of 750,000 square miles and a population of 42,000,000, sixty times the mother country in area and eight times the mother country in population. They consist of the islands of Sumatra, Borneo, Java, Madura, New Guinea, the Celebes, and numerous small islands. The island of Java alone, with 50,000 square miles in area, contains a number of people that will stagger you if you listen to what I say, and some of you will hardly believe me. On this little island, less in area and extent than the State of New York, there are to-day more than 30,000,000 people, more people than there are in the combined countries of Norway, Sweden, Holland, Belgium, Bulgaria, Servia, Roumania, Montenegro, and Greece—pretty nearly all the minor countries of Europe. These possessions are important to Holland. She is interested in the flag that flies over the Philippine Islands. We know by reading the periodicals of Japan that two or three years ago it was seriously proposed to build an island empire from Nippon south through the Philippines to and including the Dutch East Indies.

A fantastic dream, you say. Yes, but a fantastic dream is serious when there are bullets and bayonets behind it. To accomplish would require an armed conflict with England, Holland, and the United States. This dream passed when the present world war suddenly changed all things and gave Japan an opportunity vastly more to her liking. She speedily and at no sacrifice took the German possessions in China, Tsing Tao, also the Carolines, the Ladrones, and the Marshall Islands. She said it was to hold them and then give them back, but at once she proceeded to annex them, making them thoroughly Japanese, and now she says she did not mean what she said when she said she intended to give them back. But it is on the Continent of Asia where Japan's ambition now directs her attention, her energies, and her policies. With China a subject nation, Japan sees herself one of the greatest, perhaps the greatest, of the world's powers.

So Japan now has no designs on the Philippines. Indeed, she now would not make any sacrifice forcibly to acquire them. But should America withdraw her sovereignty it is as certain as both death and taxes, certain to everyone conversant with far eastern affairs, that Japan will seize an early pretext to acquire the islands. This would place her in a dangerous position as regards the vital interests of at least three great European powers.

It is already apparent that as soon as the present great war is over a new alignment of powers as related to the Orient will occur. Japan and England will not be together. England stands in the way of Japan's designs upon China and her general aggression in the Orient. Already Russia and Japan have come to an agreement for the further spoliation of China, and many Japanese writers now openly advocate an alliance with Germany. All agree that the present treaty between England and Japan should end.

Look at the map of the Orient; look and ponder. Think not of the facts of the past; think of the facts of the present and the future. Why would many nations of the world object to the withdrawal of American sovereignty over the Philippines and the acquisition of the islands by Japan? Your map tells the story and answers the question. Japan in the Philippines would menace all the trade routes of the Orient. To-day all ships sailing from Australia, New Zealand, and Tasmania, English territory, to Hongkong and Shanghai, the centers of England's interests in China, pass directly through the Philippines. Not only that, but the trade of England through Suez to Australia and her possessions in that quarter of the globe would be flanked by Japan in the Philippines. Not only that, but England's ships sailing from home through the Suez to Singapore, Hongkong, and Shanghai would be flanked for a thousand miles by Japan in the Philippines.

France also is concerned. She has possessions in Cochin China. Her communications would be flanked by Japan in the Philippines. It is but a step from the Philippines into North Borneo, the northerly tip of which island is British territory. England would not want such an easy step within the power of Japan.

Holland is deeply concerned. The very life of Holland is in her East Indies. She is alarmed at the very suggestion of Japanese occupation of the Philippines, because this would put Japan in the very midst of her possessions.

Nor is this all. The Panama Canal will inevitably become the trade route of much of England's and Holland's trade with the Orient. This trade must go through or near Philippine waters.

Thus you see the strategic, important location of the Philippines as related to the changed politics and present trade routes of the world.

All nations are satisfied with American sovereignty over there. They know we lust after no other people's land, wealth, or opportunity in life. They know we will live out the square deal between nations. But the withdrawal of that sovereignty would so disturb conditions that other nations would be constrained to have a voice and perhaps a hand in the matter.

We are in the Philippines, my friends. Our presence there means much to the Filipinos, much to the Orient. America's mission can not be fulfilled on the continent of America alone.

America must be a force in the world for the furtherance of those principles upon which she stands. Our work and our mission in the Orient should fill every American with patriotic pride. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, until I asked for time a few minutes ago I had no intention of taking part in the debate on this conference report; indeed I did not know that the report had been presented to the House and printed until I was so informed by the Resident Commissioner from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON] shortly before it was brought up and the debate opened by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

As I sat listening to the discussion memory went back to the day, 14 years ago, when I had the honor, as chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, to open the debate on a bill which in its essential features was finally enacted into the organic law of the Philippine Islands. And, while listening, I said to myself, How extraordinary the change between now and then. Then the problem of the Philippines was "paramount" in national affairs. The islands had seen bloodshed—war. The war had hardly ended. Indeed, I remember that on the day I brought up the bill the newspapers reported a new breaking out of the flames of insurrection in Mindanao. To many the future of the islands seemed desperate. The minority of the then Committee on Insular Affairs demanded in their report on the bill that we leave the islands in eight years. In that report the minority declared that our whole policy in the Philippines was unjust, cruel, and dishonoring to American citizenship. The bitterest of accusations against our Philippine policy filled the newspapers. Everywhere distinguished men were saying that it was doomed to abject failure; that it was a policy of infamous tyranny.

Men said these things—things which to-day no man believes—despite the fact that the bill contained many noble provisions, including a complete bill of rights and a provision for a Philippine legislature, of which the lower house was to be elected by the Filipino people.

Here I digress to notice the comment which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] made a moment ago on the fact that we are about to give the Philippines an elective senate. I desire to remind him and the House that the Philippines would not have had an elective lower house of their legislature during the last 14 years had it not been for the work of the Committee on Insular Affairs in 1902. It was the Committee on Insular Affairs which put that provision into the bill, and it was the House conferees which secured its retention in conference. In that year no Senator said a word in the Senate in favor of an elective lower house for the Philippines, nor was there any provision for such elective house in any Senate bill. Yet it is the success of the Philippine lower house which, more than anything else, has induced Congress to provide that the islands shall have an elective senate, and which more than all else has tended to reveal the ultimate possibility of self-government.

And now, in view of all that has come to pass in the islands, may I, without being over personal, say some things which 14 years ago I said during that debate in reply to accusations hurled against the policy of our Government in the Philippines?

We are in the islands to set wider the bounds of freedom, to secure liberty and opportunity and all the benefits of the best of modern civilizations for a down-trodden race to whom, through hopeless centuries, these blessings have been denied, and in the place of an ancient, decrepit monarchy and the divine right of kings to establish the invincible young republic and the inalienable rights of man. [Applause.]

I replied then as I do now to the prophecies of failure.

We should remember what we are. We are a city set upon a hill. Our work can not be hidden. If we fail in the Philippines our failure will be seen of all the world, and seen forever.

But we shall not fail. The Nation which in the awful days of 1861 to 1865 wrought and fought through gloom and disaster to enduring success will not fail now to carry to a triumphant consummation its lesser task in the Philippine Archipelago. We will fill that land with schoolhouses. We will sever church from state, and each shall be the stronger and the better for the separation. We will establish justice and make its administration pure. We will plant firmly the principles of free government and fix forever all of the priceless guaranties of civil and religious liberty. We will emancipate a race from the thraldom of centuries and lead them in the pathway of the world's highest civilization. [Applause.] And then when in after years the current of transforming, vitalizing influences has made the Philippine Islands the home of contentment, the abode of industry and of all the arts of peace, we who are permitted to participate in this initial legislation will look back with hearts filled with grateful, honorable pride to this hour and say, "Thank God, we—we, also—bore a part in the glorious work of a people's redemption." [Applause.]

Has not the prophecy come true—the promise been fulfilled? Yes. And the great national problem of the Philippines, which so deeply concerns the good name and fame of this Republic, is surely, steadily approaching its proper solution.

History has vindicated the policy of the Republican Party in the Philippine Islands.

The pending conference report is in effect an approval—yes, more than that—an unqualified indorsement of the work nobly begun under the beloved McKinley and continued to this hour. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I did not want this opportunity to go by without making an observation upon the character and ability of the Representative of the Philippine Islands. After seven years of association with him, after seven years of close observation, I am glad to say to-day that he illustrates the possibilities of his race. I believe that I speak the sentiment of this House when I say that no man could have more faithfully, more honestly, more courageously, and with greater ability represented the Philippine Islands than has the gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON]. [Applause.]

I am satisfied, further, that his constituency appreciates his efforts in their behalf. During the entire time he has served as their representative he has lost no opportunity of advocating what he believed to be the rights and duties of the Philippine Islands to secure independence. I am satisfied that he will go away from this legislative body with the understanding that the Congress of the United States has used every honorable means that the administration was convinced was best in the Philippines for the interest of the Philippine people. The remarkable advancement that has been made in the last 15 years in the Philippines is illustrative not only of the ability of the United States to care for this dependent people, but of the ability of the Philippine people themselves to come to the necessary understanding and to that sphere of development that is necessary for their own future self-government.

The Philippine people can see that gradually the United States has responded to what it believed to be the necessities of the Philippines—first, granting to them the right to elect a lower house of the legislative body; next, in enlarged representation to include the senate, and a further enlarged, as I understand, policy now is to give the entire administration of the government, with the exception of the Governor General and a few other offices, over to the Philippine people themselves.

I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that the work that has been done by the United States in the Philippines will bear still greater fruit than it has borne in the last 15 years. There can be no question but what these principles enunciated in the Declaration of Independence have taken firm hold of the people of these islands, and that they will in the future expect, as their merits are disclosed, that the United States will come to the execution of those measures which will give them eventually independence.

The American Government is no longer an isolated government. The great evolution of economic questions has taken it out of the sphere where it pursued lines of development according to its own selection, and has created it a world power not only in politics but in commerce, and I call attention to the fact that the introduction of the Philippines into our system of government has given rise to a new era in American politics. We have taken on additional responsibilities under the Monroe doctrine which undoubtedly will include the Philippine Islands. To that extent, Mr. Speaker, we are making ready for whatever may be necessary, not with the purpose of making any aggressive policy but for the purpose of protecting ourselves and our rights whenever we may be called upon to do so in the bill which we have just passed providing for 165 battleships of all descriptions in the construction of a navy in three years. There is to be found an indication of what we propose to do in case it is necessary to use that power to maintain our rights in the Orient as well as in this hemisphere. [Applause.]

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, when I asked for the five minutes of time, it occurred to me that I might want to say something in defense of this bill, but since we are all in favor of the bill it will not be necessary for me to occupy that time, because I believe that the best service a Member can render in this House is in voting and not talking. It occurs to me that since we are all in favor of the bill, we have arrived at the time to vote. However, I shall use a moment for another purpose. I want to take occasion here to testify to what I learned from my recent travels through the Philippine Islands, to the respect and confidence the people of those islands have in their Representative, Mr. QUEZON, and I want to speak this word of appreciation of the fidelity and ability with which he has represented his people upon the floor of this House. [Applause.] I found everywhere in the islands that the people had universal confidence in him as a man and as a Representative, in his integrity, and in his devotion to what they believed to be the best interest of those islands. I join with his numerous friends in wishing him long life, success, health, and happiness. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the Philippine bill proposes to give a wider latitude of self-government to the Philippine Islands, and contains in the preamble some pledges, and the whole attitude of gentlemen upon the Democratic side of the House and the Senate upon this bill has been that we ought not, because we have the power, to undertake to control or dominate the people of another land against their will. I was somewhat interested the other day in reading dispatches from Copenhagen in reference to the treaty relating to the purchase by the United States of the Danish West India Islands. I assume there is such a treaty. I have seen newspaper statements to that effect, and the treaty is more or less public property in Denmark, though the administration in this country has not been kind enough so far to take the American people into its confidence and divulge the provisions of the treaty or anything relating to or leading up to it.

In view of the promises and pledges concerning the Philippine Islands, it seems to me quite interesting to read to the House a few lines from some of the cablegrams from Copenhagen. This treaty has been under discussion in what would be the congress of Denmark and has been defended by the ministry there. I read from a cablegram from Copenhagen dated August 10, 1916:

> Several of the ministers took part in the debate and the statement was made in behalf of the Government that neither domestic nor economic consideration, but the internal situation, had brought the question to a head.
> The finance minister, Edward Brandes, intimated that the Government had no alternative but to accede to the desire of the United States.
> The foreign minister, Erik de Sacvenius, in opening the debate, recommended ratification of the sale. He denied that the Government was forced to sell, and added that the Government had not favored the sale of the islands because of the favorable purchase price, but because retention of the islands might possibly involve Denmark in international complications.
> Those who opposed the sale, he continued, had an easy task because the Government was unable to unveil its chief arguments in favor of the sale. What should be done, for instance, if the United States took possession of the islands? he asked. Should Denmark declare war on the United States or appeal to Europe?
> The Government felt bound to submit to the desire of a great State; the Government regretted that the colors had to be lowered, but when a hurricane was blowing one had to turn before it.

Again, I read from a dispatch from Copenhagen dated August 11, 1916:

> The opposition speakers repeatedly offered the suggestion that the population of the islands should be allowed a referendum on the proposed sale.
> Replying to this argument, the minister of foreign affairs said that during the negotiations he had asked the American Government whether it was favorable to such a referendum and that the American Government refused to sanction it. He added, however, that he was willing to bring the matter again to the attention of the United States, although he was not sure that he would succeed in obaining its consent to such a proceeding.

Mr. Speaker, while we are considering the Philippine bill, with the claims made upon the Democratic side of the House that our people have no right to govern another people against their will; that the Filipinos have a right to independence, and that we have no right to deprive them of it, I would like to know just what they think of an administration which forces Denmark to run before the hurricane, to sell their islands because of fear that we might take possession of them without the consent of Denmark, and refuse to give the people there a referendum in respect to whether they wish to come to us or not. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Of course I do not know whether the statements made by the ministers of the Government in Denmark correctly represent the attitude of the United States. Neither does anyone in the House know. These dispatches are over a week old, and I have waited to see if there would be any denial on the part of anyone connected with our administration as to the correctness of the statements. There has been no denial. I would like to know whether we have been hypocritically pretending that we must give liberty to the Philippine Islands because we have no right to maintain a government there and at the same time insisting that Denmark must deliver her Danish West India Islands to us merely because we want them. There has been so much hypocrisy—well, I shall not say that—but there has been so much talk about our rights in the Philippine Islands and our respecting the rights of the native people there, that I wonder some one has not thought of the same talk in connection with those nearer home.

I have a dispatch on the desk here from Haiti, stating where our officers in charge of the Navy there have told the Government of Haiti what they had to do. Well, I am not opposed to that, but I am opposed to making the claim in one minute that we have no right to exercise our authority over the Philippine Islands, but we have the right to do what we please with Haiti and the Danish West India Islands. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am in favor of giving to the Philippine Islands the broadest latitude of self-government which is possible. I am in favor of maintaining the power of the United States over in the Philippine Islands. I hope we will gain possession of the Danish West India Islands, but I have not yet become sufficiently hypocritical to give a reason about the Philippine Islands which I would not be willing to apply to the Danish West India Islands. Suppose it were proposed here that we sell the Philippine Islands without regard to the wishes of the Filipinos. Why, our Democratic friends would have more of a cat fit in a minute than you ever heard of before; and yet the administration proposes to take the Danish West India Islands and force Denmark, if those dispatches are correct, to sell them to us and refuse to let the people of those islands express their desire or their will in regard to the matter. When will hypocrisy cease? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. That would be a rather irregular statement for a minister of finance on his own responsibility to make unless there was some ground for it, would it not?

Mr. MANN. Well, it would be very unusual, I should think, for a minister of any government to make such a statement unless he had some ground for it. It has not been denied.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH, Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. The same situation prevailed at Panama, did it not, in our dealings with Colombia?

Mr. MANN. It did not.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. What was the difference?

Mr. MANN. We did not take Panama, to begin with, and they have a Panaman Government there. By the way, I see this morning the Government refuses to recognize the election in Panama the other day. Very likely they may be justified in it. Of that I do not know. But we did not take Panama. Panama is governed by the Panaman people, except as we interfere.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the gentleman understand from the newspaper excerpts he has been reading that the Danish people wish to sell these islands because of fear of a storm blowing from the United States?

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman get that understanding?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I did not.

Mr. MANN. I read the dispatch——

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understood from the newspapers that the sale was to obtain money to avert a storm emanating from some other nation than the United States. Of course, the gentleman will agree with me that we should take all these reports with a grain of salt.

Mr. MANN. I read from the statement reported to have been made by the minister of finance. He said:

> The Government—
> That is, the Danish Government—
> felt bound to submit to the desire of a great state; the Government regretted that the colors had to be lowered, but when a hurricane was blowing one had to run before it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Where was the hurricane blowing from?

Mr. MANN. From the United States.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not so understand the language.

Mr. MANN. There is no hurricane blowing except from the United States. No foreign country is doing anything with the West India Islands except Denmark and the United States. No other country is involved. None of the nations is interfering with the Danish West India Islands. There has been no threat on the part of any of the nations at war to seize those islands.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has it met the gentleman's notice that the Danish Government owes a large sum of money to some European power, and that it is endeavoring to sell these islands in order to pay that debt?

Mr. MANN. That is not the case as I understand it, and the minister in making the reply stated in the Danish Parliament that it was not for such reason the islands were being sold. The statement is as plain as the face of a man that the Danish minister told the Danish Parliament the United States required them to turn these islands over to us and, if they did not do it, we might seize the islands.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the newspaper article say that the United States would seize the islands? Does it purport to say that?

Mr. MANN. The minister said:

What should be done, for instance, if the United States took possession of the islands? Should Denmark declare war on the United States or appeal to Europe?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the gentleman think the statement of a Danish minister to his own Parliament expresses the view or purpose of the United States, even assuming that the language is correct? I do not think a respectable public man in America of any party has advocated or would advocate seizure of these islands.

Mr. MANN. I think, if the statements in regard to the language of a minister in the Danish Parliament, cabled to this country, are not correct, the treaty ought to be made public, and the Government ought to deny the correctness of the statement. We have no information. The papers have stated the administration asked that this treaty be not made public. It is the usual thing to make the treaties public. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HARDY). The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], who was to be recognized next, is not present. Therefore the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, the previous question was to be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the agreement, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the conference report on the Philippine bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 29.

So the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JONES, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask that all gentlemen who have spoken on this subject may extend their remarks in the RECORD during a period of five legislative days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT). The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on this subject may be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD for five legislative days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 15774), for printing under the rule; and in that connection, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent that I may file the statement later in the day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina presents the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which will be printed under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] asks unanimous consent that the statement may be presented later in the day.

Mr. MANN. Of course it will be printed?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. It will be printed with the report.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman from North Carolina state whether this is a complete agreement?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. No; it is not. It is a partial agreement.

Mr. STEENERSON. What is in disagreement?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. There are four or five different amendments on which we have not been able to agree.

Mr. STEENERSON. They will be laid before the House?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes. The conference report will be laid before the House at the proper opportunity.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does that include the half-and-half proposition?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes; without taking up too much time now, I may say it involves the half-and-half and the intangible tax amendment and the gas amendment, both of which I promised to bring back to the House, and some one or two other amendments that are not of much importance.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE]?

There was no objection.

VETO MESSAGE—ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL (H. DOC. NO. 1334).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair lays before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the message, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I have carefully considered the bill (H. R. 16460) entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, nineteen hundred and seventeen," and now take the liberty of returning it with my objections to its approval.

The bill constitutes an essential part of the legislation providing for the Military Establishment of the country and wisely and generously provides for the reorganization of the agencies of our national defense, and it is with genuine reluctance that I delay its becoming law by suggesting the elimination of one of the provisions which has been embodied in the very necessary and important revision of the Articles of War which has been added to it.

The existing Articles of War are undoubtedly archaic. They have not undergone comprehensive revision for more than 100 years. They do not always furnish the means of meeting promptly and directly the needs of discipline under modern conditions, and many contingencies now frequently arise in the government of the military forces which were not contemplated when the present code was formulated. The relations of the Government of the United States have greatly broadened within the hundred years. We now have insular possessions and national interests far away from our continental shores. Both the practice of arms and the theory of discipline have undergone many modern changes, and a manifest need for such a revision of these articles as is here presented has long existed. I, therefore, the more keenly regret to find in the proposed revision of the Articles of War a provision to which I can not give my approval.

The original act establishing the retired list of the Army (act of Aug. 3, 1861) referred to the personnel therein included as only partially retired, and provided that a retired officer should be entitled to wear the uniform of his grade, should be borne on the Army Register, and should be subject to the rules and Articles of War, and to trial by general court-martial for any breach of these articles. By the act of July 24, 1876, officers of the Army on the retired list were specifically declared to constitute a part of the Regular Army, a provision which is found repeated in subsequent acts affecting the organization of the Army; and other statutes enacted during this period made retired officers of the Army available for certain classes of active duty, in time of peace with their consent, and in time of war without their consent. By the recently enacted national defense act, the authority of the President over retired officers has been further extended so as to make them subject to his call in time of war for any kind of duty without any restriction whatever. Courts and Attorneys General have in a long line of decisions held that officers of the Army on the retired list hold public office. It thus appears that both the legislative and judicial branches have drawn a sharp distinction in status between retired officers, who are regarded and governed at all times as an effective reserve of skilled and experienced officers and a potential source of military strength, and mere pensioners, from whom no further military service is expected. Officers on the retired list of the Army are officers of the Army, members of the Military Establishment distinguished by their long service, and, as such, examples of discipline to the officers and men in the active Army. Moreover, they wear the uniform of the Army, their education and service hold them out as persons especially qualified in military matters to represent the spirit of the Military Establishment, and they are subject to active duty in time of national emergency by the mere order of the Commander in Chief. They are, therefore, members of the Army, officers of the United States, exemplars of discipline, and have in their keeping the good name and the good spirit of the entire Military Establishment before the world. Occupying such a relation, their subjection to the rules and Articles of War and to trial by general court-martial have always been regarded as necessary, in order that the retired list might not become a source of tendencies which would weaken the discipline of the active land forces and impair that control over those forces which the Constitution vests in the President.

The purpose of the Articles of War in times of peace is to bring about a uniformity in the application of military discipline which will make the entire organization coherent and effective, and to engender a spirit of cooperation and proper subordination to authority which will in time of war instantly make the entire Army a unit in its purpose of self-sacrifice and devotion to duty in the national defense. These purposes can not be accomplished if the retired officers, still a part of the Military Establishment, still relied upon to perform important duties, are excluded, upon retirement, from the wholesome and unifying effect of this subjection to a common discipline. I am persuaded that officers upon the retired list would themselves regard as an invidious and unpalatable discrimination which in effect excluded them from full membership in the profession to which they have devoted their lives, and of which by the laws of their country they are still members. So long as Congress sees fit to make the retired personnel a part of the Army of the United States, the constitutionality of the proposed exemption of such personnel from all liability under the Articles of War is a matter of serious doubt, leaving the President, as it does, without any means sanctioned by statute of exercising over the personnel thus exempted the power of command vested in him by the Constitution.

Convinced, as I am, of the unwisdom of this provision and of its baneful effect upon the discipline of the Army; doubting, as I do, the power of Congress wholly to exempt retired officers from the control of the President, while declaring them to be a part of the Regular Army of the United States, I am constrained to return this bill without my approval.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 18, 1916.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to refer the veto message of the President to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia moves to refer the veto message of the President to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MANN. The bill and the veto.

Mr. HAY. Yes; the bill and the veto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The message and the bill are so referred.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I will state that about two hours ago, on hearing that the President had vetoed the Army appropriation bill, I introduced a bill exactly like the Army appropriation bill as it passed the two Houses, with the exception of that part of the bill containing the Articles of War. That bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask unanimous consent that it shall be in order on Tuesday next to consider that bill under suspension of the rules.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman move to suspend the rules.

Mr. HAY. That it may be in order for me to move to suspend the rules on Tuesday and pass that bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman know the number?

Mr. HAY. The number is H. R. 17498. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that that may be done. It is not necessary to have the bill reported.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not moving now for the passage of the bill?

Mr. HAY. No; I am not moving now for the passage of the bill. I am simply asking that it shall be in order for me on Tuesday next to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that on Tuesday next it shall be in order for him to move to suspend the rules and pass the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will have to get the number.

Mr. HAY. The bill is numbered H. R. 17498. I introduced the bill two or three hours ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the inquiry the Chair made a moment ago.

Mr. HAY. If the Chair will put in the request the Army appropriation bill introduced by me to-day——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that on Tuesday next it shall be in order for him to move to suspend the rules and consider the Army appropriation bill, H. R. 17498, introduced by him to-day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHILD LABOR.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Chair to lay before the House the conference report on the bill (H. R. 8234) known as the child-labor bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] calls up the conference report on the bill H. R. 8234, the child-labor bill, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1107).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8234) "To prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

DAVID J. LEWIS,
J. M. C. SMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOS. T. ROBINSON,
MOSES E. CLAPP,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, as the members will recall, this bill, known as the child-labor bill, having passed the House went to the Senate, and the Senate passed it with certain amendments. I may say that the amendments by the Senate did not modify in any way the general objective of the bill—that is, the acts and the species of conduct intended to be prohibited by the House measure—but in considering the methods that should be employed for that purpose, especially in the leading, and what I may call the prohibitive clause, the Senate adopted a method of treatment somewhat different from that adopted by the House.

The House method of treatment was to stigmatize the particular products of child labor, in whole or in part, and prohibit the movement in interstate commerce of any such particular products. That clause, section 1, was amended by the Senate, and its treatment provides that wherever children are shown to have been employed by a manufacturer, and so forth, under the prohibited conditions, within one month of the offer of shipment of the product of such factory, then any shipment of any product of such factory shall be denied the privilege of interstate commerce.

I shall not go into any discussion of the slightly different constitutional aspects presented by the House method of treatment and the Senate method of treatment, unless discussion of that subject shall be considered necessary this afternoon. It may be said in favor of the Senate treatment that it renders the administration of the law itself, and the effectuation of the prohibitions of the law, easier than the House treatment would do, and is to be strongly recommended on that account. The difficulties in the way of obtaining evidence, of particularizing the special articles of the product of a mill which were sophisticated by child labor, in whole or in part, at once suggest themselves under the House treatment of the matter. The Senate treatment eliminates those difficulties, because any shipment of any of its products within one month after child labor has been employed in the factory makes out a case, under the indictment, for the Government. It need only prove that within one month of the objected shipment child labor was employed in the factory from which the article proceeded.

Before concluding I wish to express my appreciation of the valuable aid those in charge of the bill have received from its legislative author, Mr. KEATING, of Colorado.

If no gentleman desires any further information, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HARRISON). The gentleman from Maryland moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

THE NATIONAL GUARD.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House resolution 326 (H. Rept. 1147).

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the House of Representatives how many members of the National Guard taken into the service of the United States in compliance with the President's order of June 18, 1916, are recruits without any previous military experience.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL LABOR FOR FOLDING SPEECHES.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 335 (H. Rept. 1146).

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper is authorized to employ additional labor for folding speeches, at the rate of not exceeding $1 per 1,000, and that the sum of $2,500 is authorized to be expended out of the contingent fund for that purpose.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6625) authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain donations of condemned cannon and cannon balls, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 16700. An act to amend "An act relating to the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia," approved March 4, 1913.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15774) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, had further insisted upon its amendments still in disagreement, had asked a further conference with the House on said amendments, and had appointed Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. ROBINSON, and Mr. GALLINGER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 14338) to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. NELSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 19) relating to bills of lading in interstate and foreign commerce.

BITUMINOUS COAL.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 352.

Whereas it is alleged that unfair methods of competition are widely practiced in the bituminous coal-mining industry of the United States; and

Whereas it is alleged that in consequence thereof the industry in many districts has been demoralized financially, and numerous operating companies have been forced into receiverships; and

Whereas it is also alleged that in consequence thereof some 200,000,000 tons of coal are permanently lost to the Nation each year by unwise and improvident methods of mining; and

Whereas it is further alleged that in consequence thereof some 500,000 employees at the mines are kept idle from one-fourth to one-third of the working time, with much ensuing hardship and loss to themselves and those dependent upon them; and

Whereas such conditions, if existing in the bituminous coal industry, vitally touch the interests and welfare of the public as a whole: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and is hereby, directed to begin and make inquiry immediately into the conditions in the production and distribution of bituminous coal and to report the facts to Congress with recommendations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are many other industries in the United States that are just as much in jeopardy as the coal industry is. If the Federal Trade Commission are to be authorized to investigate the difficulties that surround the coal industry, there is no reason why they should not be permitted or requested or required to investigate all the other industries. We have 250,000 corporations in the United States, and about 100,000 of these corporations lose money every year. Of course, some of them are engaged in the coal business, some of them are engaged in the stone-quarry business, some of them are engaged in manufacturing iron and steel, and all other kinds of things. Of the remaining 150,000 corporations, we have about 60,000 that do not make $5,000 a year, and we have a large number of corporations engaged in manufacturing, mining, and other industries of the country that are living from hand to mouth. Neither the men employed in them nor the owners of the institutions are able to get the income from them which their industry justifies. It does not seem to me that the coal industry ought to be specially selected for this kind of an investigation. If I give consent for the consideration of this resolution, I would like to offer an amendment which will include corporations and industries of other kinds, as well as the coal industry.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I will say to my colleague that at the present time the Federal Trade Commission, under a Senate resolution (S. Res. 217, 1st sess. 64th Cong.) are investigating the anthracite coal industry of the United States. They find that the two industries, the bituminous coal industry and the anthracite coal industry, overlap and merge in such a way that an investigation of both industries can be conducted at the same time and with the same amount of difficulty and expense as the investigation of only one of them. This investigation has been requested both by the operators and by the men who labor in the mines, and has been requested by the following organizations among others: The Chamber of Commerce of the United States, the American Federation of Labor, the United Mine Workers of the World, the American Mining Congress, Pennsylvania and Ohio Coal Operators, Central West Virginia Coal Operators' Association, Splint & Gas Coal Association of West Virginia, Southern Appalachian Coal Operators' Association, Southwestern Coal Operators' Association, the Chicago Coal Merchants' Association, Indiana Coal Operators' Association, Indiana Coal Trade Bureau, Franklin County Coal Operators' Association (Illinois), Williamson County Coal Operators' Association (Illinois), Central Illinois Coal Bureau.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. I am willing to concede the fact that most of the people engaged in this line of industry are losing money and that the trade is in a demoralized condition, and that there is some necessity for some such investigation as the resolution my colleague contemplates, but there are industries that are in as precarious condition as this, and my thought is that while the investigation is going on that it ought to cover a wider field, but if this is simply to complete an investigation that has already begun——

Mr. RAINEY. That is all.

Mr. MADDEN (continuing). I am not going to object, but some day in the not distant future I shall ask to have other industries, just as badly off as this, turned over to the Federal Trade Commission for investigation and report.

Mr. RAINEY. And I shall not object to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

JACOB HOFFMAN.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I call up House resolution 343.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana calls up House resolution 343, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 343.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the House of Representatives with a statement showing why Jacob Hoffman (Naeger), a citizen of the United States of America, born and raised in Dubois County, Ind., is now arrested and detained by the English military authorities at Victoria, British Columbia, Canada, and to furnish the House with information showing what crime, or crimes, if any, the said Jacob Hoffman (Naeger) has committed against the British Government in Canada, showing when he was arrested, by whom, and by what authority, whether by military or civil authority, whether arrested upon affidavit duly sworn to or upon oral authority or upon suspicion, and whether he has ever been given a trial and hearing, and if so, when and where, and before what tribunal, military or civil, and what was the judgment and decree of the court imposed upon him, and where he is now and how confined.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana calls this up as a privileged resolution, and the question is on its passage.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

EMPLOYMENT OF FEDERAL PRISONERS.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 151, authorizing the appointment of a special joint commission of the Senate and House of Representatives to investigate the employment of Federal prisoners in industrial occupations for the benefit of the Government of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the resolution at length.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, there are a number of special orders to-day. Gentlemen have been here all day waiting, and I do not think it is exactly right to take up the entire time of the day with these matters. If there is to be absolutely no discussion on this matter I will not object, but if there is to be any, I shall object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate joint resolution.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire just a minute to make a statement, and that is all. This is the resolution introduced at the instigation of the Attorney General of the United States in the Senate by Senator SMITH of Georgia, and in the House by myself. The two resolutions are identical. On or about the 1st of June, 1917, in the United States penitentiaries at Leavenworth and at Atlanta, the building program of these penitentiaries will have been completed. The object of this resolution is to appoint a general committee of the Senate and House for the purpose of making an investigation as to what uses the convicts can be put to for the Government of the United States, and to make a report at the next session of Congress for the purpose of determining what they will do, so that they will not come in contact, either locally or generally, with the free labor of the country. It is an important resolution. The Attorney General has urged that it be done; and it has already passed the Senate, and I hope that my good and distinguished friend from Illinois will not object, so that at the next session of Congress we can have some information before us that will be of some value to the House and the Senate in order that Congress may properly legislate for these convicts. If something is not done the Attorney General says that all of next year the convicts will have nothing to do, because the cell houses are already complete and the penitentiaries will be completed by that time.

Mr. MANN. I am in sympathy with the general purpose of the resolution of employing convicts in Government prisons. That matter has been under consideration for hundreds and thousands of years, and very actively under consideration in this country for a good many years. I do not think it is possible for a committee of Congress between the adjournment of this Congress and next December to settle this question. That is what is proposed by the resolution. I hope that the Attorney General will have some one go ahead and make an investigation relative to the matter. I know that Members of Congress after adjournment—and nobody knows when that is going to take place—will be mostly engaged in taking a necessary vacation or getting ready to prevent a two years' enforced vacation. I think this ought to be considered, and I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] is recognized for 30 minutes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. What became of the proposition of the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] where he asked to have laid before the House a Senate bill, there being a similar bill on the House Calendar? Has that gone over for the afternoon?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at the time of those proceedings. He was, however, upon the floor of the House, and, as the Chair recalls, upon the gentleman calling up the bill the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] made the point of order that no quorum was present, and then subsequently withdraw that point of order.

Mr. MANN. A privileged matter came in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Thereupon the Speaker recognized other gentlemen. The Chair would be of opinion, just from his personal recollection, that the matter called up by the gentleman from California is pending before the House at this time, and if the point be made the Chair will so hold.

Mr. MANN. I am not seeking to bring the matter before the House. I am only seeking to know what was going to be done with it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will ask the gentleman from California if he has withdrawn his motion?

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, in view of the anxiety of a great many Members to occupy a good deal of time this afternoon I am going to ask that my matter go over until the next session of the House.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman need not ask to go over. He can simply withdraw his present request.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I withdraw the present request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California withdraws his request.

Mr. STAFFORD. With the understanding that it will not be presented again to-day?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what is the order of business of the House for this afternoon?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order of the House several gentlemen are to be recognized for the purpose of addressing the House.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair kindly state in what order they come?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. According to a memorandum before the Chair the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] is first to be recognized for 30 minutes, then the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY] for 30 minutes, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] for 60 minutes, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] for 60 minutes, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ALLEN] for 15 minutes, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] for an hour, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] for 30 minutes, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] for 30 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, an order has already been entered that gentlemen who are not reached to-day in their order are to be carried over until Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] is recognized under a previous order heretofore made for 30 minutes.

JUSTICE CHARLES EVANS HUGHES.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, when amid the sounding of many trumpets and the blare of many bands the national Republican convention at Chicago brought forth as their candidate for the Presidency of this great Republic Justice Charles Evans Hughes, of the Empire State of New York, it was proclaimed throughout the length and breadth of the land that the distracted Republican Party had at last found a Moses who was to lead that benighted band of hungry patriots out of the wilderness. It was the most sudden, unexpected prearranged nomination ever handed to a waiting, expectant, unwilling nominee. It was the first exhibition in American political life of an active candidate for office accepting under protest a nomination which had been industriously sought for many months. For many weeks after this most remarkable political performance the people were daily regaled with columns of articles in many newspapers and magazines descriptive of this marvelous leader and his mission in the world. He was pictured as a towering giant among his fellows, especially annointed for the purpose and sent into the political world to right all the wrongs, redress all the grievances, and obliterate all the inequalities which afflict mankind. It was loudly proclaimed both by the "old guard" and the shattered remnants of the valorous legion which four years ago followed the "waving plume" of "Terrible Teddy," that under the matchless leadership of this mighty man the Republican hosts would again march to victory and direct the destinies of the Republic.

With this picture in mind the people waited expectantly for the mighty one to make his first deliverance, having every right to assume that it would be weighty with statesmanlike utterances and filled with thoughts and suggestions for the betterment of mankind. As his mission was to right the wrongs, redress the grievances, and wipe out the inequalities existing among his countrymen, they supposed he had a message to deliver which would carry some remedial suggestion. It was understood that he was too big of brain to content himself with merely complaining of existing evils, but that he would go further and prescribe the remedy; that he would not simply criticize conditions but would also point out the necessary reforms. Carping criticism and remediless complaint are both the products of the small brain, and of course nothing of this kind was expected from the eminent justice and brilliant former governor of the greatest State in all the Union.

Finally, the great day when the oracle was to make deliverance came, and the whole people anxiously waited for the words of wisdom and statesmanship that never fell upon their ears. Mr. Speaker, when I read that speech of acceptance delivered by Mr. Hughes, I involuntarily exclaimed, "How have the mighty fallen." [Applause on the Democratic side.] A speech of some 8,000 words, filled with criticism and complaint, and not one word of remedy throughout the whole affair. He complains of the manner in which the President acted on a number of occasions, but never once does he intimate how he would have acted had he been President. He complains of the action of the President, but never once does he declare that he would have acted differently. Throughout the entire speech nothing remedial is suggested, no reform is mentioned, no constructive legislation is advocated, and on the whole the distinguished gentleman seemed to be mortally afraid that he might directly or indirectly commit himself on some inconsequential proposition. That speech reminds me of a story told on another distinguished gentleman, who was at one time governor of another State. This governor had the reputation of never taking a positive stand on any question. A newspaper man on one occasion sought to interview him on a certain pending important public question. Every time he asked a question the governor parried, and finally the newspaper man gave up in disgust, but on leaving he turned to the governor and in sarcastic tones said: "Well, governor, what do you think of the equator?" "Well, my friend," said the governor, "I hardly know; the fact is a good deal can be said on both sides of it." [Laughter.]

Mr. Hughes could find no issue in his speech of acceptance, but after he struck the trail toward the limitless West, he has found two or three issues upon which, I suppose, he wants this campaign fought out. I shall not discuss the very heinous charge he makes against the administration of supplanting two Republicans with two Democrats in minor departmental positions. Of course that was real cruel, and according to the supersensitive ideas of the great justice should not have been done, but I am a disciple of Andrew Jackson and believe that "to the victor belongs the spoils," and therefore it would have suited me exactly if every place in the Government service had been filled by a Democrat. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What I desire to refer to briefly is the puny effort of Mr. Hughes to dig up the "bloody shirt" and wave it again for his personal advantage over a happy, united, and contented people.

Mr. Speaker, I refer to this matter with regret and sorrow. Regret that one of such supposed high ideals, patriotic impulses, and broadness of view could stoop to so unenviable a task, and sorrow that at this late day a candidate of a great party for the Presidency can be found who is willing to pitch the campaign on so low a plane. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The brave men of the North and the South—they who for four long years bore the shock of battle—ceased fighting at Appomattox. They had tested the metal of each other on many a hard-fought and blood-stained field, and finally, when the star of the Southern Confederacy went down in the gloom of defeat on the field of Appomattox, both sides to that awful conflict had a wholesome respect for the other. Arms were grounded, and the soldiers of Lee and Grant went home and set about the task of building a stronger, better, and more powerful Republic. From that April day in 1865 until this good hour no real soldier, whether he wore the blue or the gray, has been known to utter a single sentiment meant to reopen the wounds of sectional strife.

It is true that for many years after the close of that fratricidal struggle vicious politicians on both sides frantically waved the "bloody shirt" in the interest of their political fortunes, but these men never smelled gunpowder and if in view of the struggle at all it was in the capacity of camp followers. It was hoped, Mr. Speaker, that this tribe of political leaders had "gone the way of all the earth" and that we should "never look upon their like again," but in this goodly year of 1916, when our people are enjoying the fruits of profound peace and our land is smiling with plenty, this great leader of the Republican Party without any real issue to present to the people, has descended from the lofty mount of real statesmanship to the muddy plain of demagogy and is attempting to rally the Republican hosts to the standard of the "bloody shirt."

It will be remembered that the South tried to leave the Union and to leave it peaceably, but our northern brethren said, "No, you shall not leave us. You are a part of this Union and you must stay in it." Four years of war followed and the South was kept in the Union by force. Now, 51 years after the end of that war we find a Republican candidate for President going about over the land proclaiming in substance that the Southern States are in the Union—in fact that they never were out—but that they have no right to participate in the Government of the United States. He charges the present administration with being sectional and in proof of his charges he asserts that practically all the committees of Congress have chairmen from the South. Mr. Hughes knows that it has always been the custom of both parties to settle the chairmanships of committees by the rule of seniority and he further knows that as the South has steadily kept her Democratic Representatives here these gentlemen are entitled to their chairmanships under the operation of this rule of seniority.

He attempts to leave the impression upon his audiences that practically all the House committees have southern chairmen and that therefore the "South is in the saddle." I have prepared a statement showing who are the chairmen in the present (Sixty-fourth) Democratic Congress, and it will appear that the 11 seceding Southern States have 31 chairmen, the border States, and by this I mean the Middle States of Kentucky, West Virginia, Maryland, Missouri, and Oklahoma, have 11 chairmen, and the Northern States have 17 chairmen. The table is as follows:

I want to say here that among the 17 chairmen of the House who come from the North stands preeminently that gallant Union soldier, whom every patriot in this House, be he Democrat or Republican, must love, Gen. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. [Applause.] If we are not to be trusted, if we are aliens in our own land, why should we elevate this distinguished general of the Union Army? It is because he is a patriot, because he is a true representative of the people of the country, and is entitled to it by the seniority rule. As I said before, every man from the North or from the South must admire, respect, and love this gallant man, than whom there was no nobler in all the hosts that followed Grant. [Applause.] Another man, who is a younger one, from that same State is also chairman of an important committee, and I refer to that brilliant young Democrat from the State of Ohio, Mr. JOHN A. KEY, chairman of the Committee on Pensions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If the fact that the South has a few more chairmen in the House in this Democratic Congress than the North makes this a sectional administration, what must be thought of the administrations during the Fifty-eighth, Fifty-ninth, Sixtieth, and Sixty-first Congresses, when the Republicans controlled the House, and during which four Congresses not a solitary man from the South held a chairmanship, although in each of those Congresses there were some very able Republican Members from the South? I present tables showing the names and States of the chairmen in those four Congresses.

There sat on the Republican side during those Congresses such men as Walter P. Brownlow, of Tennessee; RICHARD W. AUSTIN, now with us, a magnificent Representative; Nathan W. Hale, of Tennessee; Grant, of North Carolina; and others; and yet in all these four Congresses not a single southern Republican was chairman of a committee. Aye, more than that, Mr. Speaker, if they will go back to the Fifty-fourth Congress, they will find that the State of Maine had only four Representatives in that Congress. Mr. Reed, of Maine, was the Speaker; Mr. Dingley, of Maine, was the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and therefore the majority leader upon the floor of the House; Mr. Boutelle, of Maine, was chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs; and Mr. Milliken, of Maine, was chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Here is the lists of chairmanships in the four Republican Congresses referred to:

Talk about sectionalism! What does Mr. Hughes think of the Fifty-fourth Congress, which was Republican? Maine, as I have before stated, had four Representatives in the House in the Fifty-fourth Congress. Mr. Reed, of Maine, was the Speaker; Mr. Dingley, of Maine, was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and therefore majority leader on the floor; Mr. Boutelle, of Maine, was chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs; and Mr. Milliken, of Maine, was chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

But, Mr. Speaker, this is not sectionalism, and no one knows it any better than does Mr. Hughes. He simply thinks it is a "good enough Morgan" for him in his dire extremity. I regret exceedingly that he has sought to inject sectionalism into this campaign. We are all Americans and all interested in the welfare of our country, and no man can be a patriot who would seek to disturb the general feeling of brotherly affection now happily prevailing all over the land. The South has given many and indisputable evidences of her unfaltering allegiance to the better interests of this Government, and I hazard nothing in saying that her noble sons will respond as quickly and go as far in defense of "Old Glory" as will the sons of any other portion of our beloved land. The Democrats upon this floor have written into the laws of the land the greatest constructive legislation which ever blessed any country, and under the continued leadership of Woodrow Wilson we will for another four years enact beneficent legislation for the whole country, ignoring section and having in mind only the "greatest good to the greatest number" of the citizenship of this Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I have felt constrained to say that much with reference to the speeches of Mr. Hughes. There is another matter to which I desire to refer, as I stated in the beginning, entirely disconnected from this; and I am going to have to ask, Mr. Speaker, the privilege of incorporating most of my remarks in the RECORD, because I shall not have time to cover the ground that I desire to cover. I ask that permission now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. How much more time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has five and one-half minutes remaining.

SUPERVISING ARCHITECT'S OFFICE.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I shall not undertake to consume the time of the House to speak further. Suffice it to say it has been the business, apparently, of the Supervising Architect's Office for months past to send out interviews in the newspapers criticizing Congress, criticizing committees of Congress, charging them with wasteful extravagance in this public-buildings matter, when the fact is, under the law, the whole blame for any extravagance, if there has been any, is chargeable to the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

As I have said here before, and as I now repeat, we never undertake to do more in any case except to fix a maximum beyond which the Treasury shall not go. They are at liberty to build for any sum which they think will be sufficient under that maximum amount. And I want to state that in the bill that we reported, in almost every solitary case, the committee has cut down the estimates of the Supervising Architect's Office, in many cases more than 75 per cent. In every case, practically, there has been a reduction from what they have recommended, and yet they charge this committee and charge the different Congresses with extravagance.

Mr. Speaker, I shall close and insert the remainder of my remarks in the RECORD under the leave granted. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, on the 12th day of this month there was printed in the RECORD, beginning at page 12532, an attack upon the omnibus public-building bill, lately reported to the House by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. In this attack it is stated that the same was prepared "by the architect's office," meaning, I suppose, the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury. This remarkable document—remarkable for its failure to state the real facts—presents a lot of figures, names of towns, and so forth, for which sites and buildings are provided in the bill, and then proclaims: "These figures were prepared at the architect's office," as though that was a clincher and settled the whole business. If the gentleman who stood sponsor for this effusion had have had the experience with the Supervising Architect's Office which the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has had, he would not so confidently bank on figures coming from that source. So absolutely unreliable has this committee come to regard estimates and figures from the Supervising Architect's Office that very little attention is paid to them in reaching a conclusion in a given case. The fact is that a departmental lawyer is now Acting Supervising Architect, and has been such for many months past. But let us examine the complaint of the eminent gentleman who gets his figures from the "architect's office." Twelve towns are named in this effusion and, although it is not stated, I presume that objection is made to them. Before mentioning these places, however, I desire, Mr. Speaker, to make an observation or two with reference to the law and the method of procedure by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. In the first place, let me state that we have an act of Congress—a part of the law of the land—which defines what cities and towns are entitled to public buildings. The senior Senator from Indiana, Senator KERN, is, if I am not badly mistaken, the author of the law. This provision of law can be found in the public-building bill approved March 4, 1913, and provides as follows:

Provided, That hereafter no authorization shall be made for the construction of a building to be used exclusively for post-office purposes at any town or city where the postal receipts have not reached the sum of $10,000 annually, nor shall any authorization for the purchase of a site for post-office purposes only be made at any town or city where the postal receipts have not reached the sum of $6,000 annually.

Thus it will be seen that under the law a city or town where there is no Federal activity other than a post office is not entitled to a site unless the postal receipts amount to $6,000 per annum and is not entitled to a building unless its postal receipts amount to $10,000 per annum. This is the law, and it is not simply a rule of the committee, as some people seem to think. Now it will be observed that this law does not undertake to fix any rule with reference to cities and towns where Federal activities in addition to the post office are located. In those cases the committee undertakes to weigh the facts and circumstances in each and determine each case upon its own merits. With these matters in mind, let me call your attention to the 12 towns named in the document referred to.

The first is Eminence, Ky. The Government already owns a site at Eminence, and the committee felt that it would be best to put buildings at the few places where sites were owned. My own opnion, Mr. Speaker, is that the law should be changed and that we should not buy a site until the place is large enough to justify a building.

Falmouth, Ky.: Site already owned. Federal activities are post office and agriculture.

Green River, Wyo.: Site already owned. Estimated population now over 2,000, and growing fast. County seat. Union Pacific Railway shops located there.

Mount Olive, N. C.: Site already owned. Present estimated population 2,000, and growing rapidly.

Rossville, Ga.: Part of town in Tennessee. Present estimated population 5,000, and growing fast. Many factories, woolen mills, and other industries.

Huntingdon, Tenn.: Site already owned.

Clearwater, Fla.: Has more than the required $10,000 annual postal receipts, and is a very thriving, growing place.

Hazard, Ky.: Site already owned. Post office and mine rescue station. Present estimated population 3,500. Center of coal region, with 15 coal mines within a radius of 4 miles.

Lewisburg, W. Va.: Post office, United States court, agriculture, and civil service are the Federal activities. Present estimated population is 2,500. I maintain that a building should be constructed by the Government wherever a Federal court is held, even if it should be held at "a little crossroad country town." And right here let me remark that as this document was inserted in the RECORD for very evident campaign purposes, it might be well for the party at interest to consider that there are a few votes in the "little crossroad country" towns as well as in the metropolitan cities.

The next place coming under the condemnation of the "architect's office" is Norton, Kans. Norton is a county seat, with an estimated population of 3,500, and has the post office, civil service, and agriculture to be housed.

Pittsfield, Ill., is the last of the 12. Pittsfield has more than $11,000 of annual postal receipts, and therefore comes squarely within the law.

It will be noticed, Mr. Speaker, that in these 12 places alone the committee in the bill reported has allowed $10,000 less than the total amount estimated by the Supervising Architect's office.

I ask leave now, Mr. Speaker, to insert at this place as a part of my remarks an analysis of the entire bill, showing the total authorizations by States, from which it will be seen that the committee has cut the estimates of the Supervising Architect's office to the tune of $4,610,500. In other words, if we had followed the estimates furnished by the office of the Supervising Architect, the grand total of the bill would have been increased by $4,610,500. It will be noticed that the committee placed in the bill items amounting to $9,575,000, on which no estimates were had.

Grand total of department estimates, $32,608,500.
On these estimates the committee allowed $27,998, cutting the departmental estimates $4,610,500.
Items in the bill on which the department did not estimate total $9,575,000.

It must be understood that the bill reported by this committee carries not a dollar of appropriation. The bill only seeks to fix a maximum in each particular item beyond which the Treasury Department must not go, but that department will be at liberty under the law to build in each and every case, as cheaply as possible; and while the authorizations amount in the aggregate to approximately some $37,000,000, I am absolutely convinced that a Supervising Architect's Office conducted along commonsense lines can carry every single item in the bill into effect with an expenditure of not exceeding the sum of $20,000,000. This whole matter is in the hands of the Supervising Architect's Office, and although they have for a long time been making a desperate effort to do so, they can not shift the responsibility onto the Congress. For many months last past the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, having public buildings in charge, has been giving out interviews to the newspapers charging Congress with gross waste of the public funds in the matter of public-building construction and painting himself as the mighty defender of the Public Treasury against the raids of rapacious Representatives. This stuff has finally become nauseating. In view of the facts it is superbly ridiculous. Mr. Speaker, I undertake to say with full knowledge of all the facts that no bureau of this Government is so badly managed as is the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury. If there is, then God help the Government!

The truth of this whole business is that our committee became so thoroughly convinced of the unreliability of estimates from the Supervising Architect's Office that we ceased to pay much attention to them. There are, in subordinate capacities, many deserving and competent employees of that office, but the directing spirits, devoting most of their time to posing before the public in newspaper interviews, have developed greater thirst for office and less capacity to fill it than any people of my acquaintance. If these people would devote less time to the abuse of Members of Congress and more to Federal building construction the Government would certainly be the gainer. They would not get so much newspaper publicity, to be sure, but the finances of the Government would not suffer so severely.

Mr. Speaker, there is another reason why the Supervising Architect's Office is making war upon this bill. The reason is that this committee never consulted the Supervising Architect's Office as to the formation of this bill. This is one bill reported to Congress which is absolutely free from any departmental dictation or suggestion. These gentlemen are mad because this committee of Congress did not seek for and act upon their advice. The idea that a congressional committee would have the temerity to report a bill without their advice and consent is something which apparently they can not comprehend.

Mr. Speaker, as one Member of this House, I am tired of the arrogant assumption of the little bureaucrats who infest the departments of this Government. I am the chosen Representative of about 300,000 people upon this floor, and I propose to represent those people to the best of the ability that God may give me, holding myself responsible to them and them only. We are to make the law, and it is the duty of the executive officers to enforce it. We should compel them to do this and not allow them to usurp functions which do not concern them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of John Ericsson.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of John Ericsson. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech of Andrew Jay Frame to the State Bankers' Association, of Colorado, at Denver, on July 21, 1916, on the subject of Monopolization against Independent Banking.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the speech indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DAIRIES AND DAIRY PRODUCTS.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, some time ago the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] introduced a resolution in this House asking for the appointment of a committee to investigate the dairies and dairy products of the country, to determine what legislation, if any, was necessary in order to reasonably protect the health and property of the citizens of the United States.

As a part of the said resolution there was attached a preamble which reads as follows:

Whereas it is reported by the Bureau of Animal Industry that 94.5 per cent of the creameries of the country are insanitary to a greater or less degree; that 61.5 per cent of the cream used is unclean or decomposed or both; that 72.6 per cent of the cream is not pasteurized, but is made into butter to be consumed in a raw state, in which state disease germs retain their virulence for a long time; that a large percentage of all dairy cattle are affected with tuberculosis, and that affected dairy products are active agents in spreading tuberculosis, typhoid fever, and other infectious diseases.

The preamble to the gentleman's resolution constitutes a highly sensational and unjustifiable attack upon the dairy products of the whole country, and its wide publication by its author has undoubtedly brought much joy to the enemies of the dairy industry of the country.

The one great fault with the preamble of the gentleman's resolution is that it is untrue and is not supported by any report ever made by the Bureau of Animal Industry, notwithstanding the fact that it pretends to be justified by a report of the said bureau.

REPORT STALE AND DISTORTED.

The report of the Bureau of Animal Industry referred to by the gentleman from Maryland in the preamble to his resolution was stale at the time it came to his notice; in fact, very stale, being almost four years of age. Even if the facts regarding the dairy industry as examined at that time and as set out in that report were true at that time, it can not be contended that the said facts as found represent the condition of the dairy industry of the whole country, or any part of it, at the present time.

During the months of April, May, and June of the year 1912 the Bureau of Animal Industry investigated 144 creameries and skimming stations in six States, out of about 6,000 creameries and 40,000 skimming stations in all the States. There was no attempt made to investigate the dairy interests of the whole country, and the report made by the Agriculture Department and referred to by the gentleman from Maryland in the preamble to his resolution did not pretend to cover any creameries and skimming stations other than those investigated. In other words, the report of the Bureau of Animal Industry for 1912 had reference to the 144 creameries and skimming stations examined, and not to all the creameries and skimming stations of the whole country, as the gentleman from Maryland would have the consumers of the dairy products believe.

NO ALARM AMONG OFFICIALS.

The report of the Bureau of Animal Industry for the year 1912, which apparently first came to the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Maryland in the year 1916, and which, it seems, made him extremely unhappy and caused him to introduce his now famous resolution and to launch a nation-wide propaganda in advocacy of the passage of the same, a propaganda that could not result otherwise than to cause irreparable injury to one of the great industries of the country, did not seem to disturb the Secretary of Agriculture or the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry, or the head of the Dairy Division of the Department of Agriculture.

The Secretary of Agriculture and the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry have each made three reports to Congress since 1912, the year of the report on which the gentleman's resolution is supposed to be based, and yet neither one of these officials, as far as I can learn, expressed in their respective reports any alarm over the dairy situation as revealed by the examination of the said 144 creameries and skimming stations in the summer of 1912, or requested an investigation by Congress of the dairy interests of this country.

Mr. B. H. Raul, Chief of the Dairy Division, Department of Agriculture, on the hearing of the gentleman's resolution, stated that—

The facts reported some three or four years ago served as an indication. I want to say, however, that the percentage given as insanitary to a greater or less degree was not intended by the department to mean that the conditions were dangerous to this extent. In other words, there are several factors involved; say, perhaps, a dozen or more essential features. Some of these creameries were deficient in one, some in two, some in four, and some in more; so that statement I think possibly has been misinterpreted by some. It certainly was not intended to be understood that that per cent was regarded as being in a dangerous condition.

The fact that a creamery is reported as insanitary by an inspector does not necessarily mean that the product turned out by that creamery is unwholesome, as Mr. Raul says.

The fact that a building was not painted on the outside and probably not whitewashed or painted on the inside; that it did not have the proper kind of sidewalks around the building or that there was too much moisture on the floor at the time the æsthetic inspector made his call would be sufficient to mark it down as insanitary.

The gentleman from Maryland, in his endeavor to secure the passage of his resolution by this House, has made two speeches in support of the same, and he has sent his resolution and speeches regarding the dairy interests of this country broadcast over the land.

The dairy men have no objection to an investigation of the dairy industry by Congress, by the Department of Agriculture, or by the different State and local authorities. They invite investigation; they invite suggestions and assistance helpful in their efforts to produce the best in the line of dairy products.

But they do most emphatically object and protest against the propaganda launched by the gentleman from Maryland in support of his resolution. The preamble to the gentleman's resolution, his speeches and circular letters that he has seen fit to send into every nook and corner of the land, are filled with misinformation and untruths regarding the actual condition of the dairy industry, and could not help but cause unjustifiable alarm among the consumers of dairy products.

In the circular letters and speeches sent out by the gentleman from Maryland in an endeavor to bring pressure to bear on Congress the gentleman asserts that Dr. Melvin, of the Bureau of Animal Industry, had testified during the hearing on his bill that a large per cent of the dairy products consumed by the American people were unfit for food, and that an investigation such as the gentleman's resolution called for would be helpful; that Dr. Schroeder, of the Department of Agriculture, had testified that 6,000 babies under 5 years of age die annually in this country from bovine tuberculosis.

It is true that Dr. Melvin did testify substantially as set forth in the letter of the gentleman from Maryland in one part of his testimony, but in another part of his testimony Dr. Melvin testified that the great bulk of the cream of the country was fit for use and that only a small part of it was unfit for food.

It is true that Dr. Melvin testified that he thought the investigation would be helpful, but he also testified that even if he knew that the dairy products of the country were perfect an investigation would still be necessary, in his judgment, because of the charges made against the dairy interests, referring to the charges of the gentleman from Maryland.

It would seem, as far as the record goes, that it never occurred to Dr. Melvin that there was any occasion for an investigation of the dairy interests of this country, as proposed by the gentleman from Maryland, until he had so distorted the report of the doctor's bureau for 1912, regarding the conditions of the 144 creameries examined as to cast a cloud over the whole dairy industry of the country.

BOVINE TUBERCULOSIS AMONG CHILDREN.

The strong card played by the gentleman from Maryland in his circular letter, sent out to the women's clubs of the country after the hearing on his resolution, was his statement that Dr. Schroeder, of the Bureau of Animal Industry, had testified that 6,000 children under 5 years of age die every year from bovine tuberculosis.

Here again the gentleman, intentionally or unintentionally, distorted, misconstrued, or misunderstood the testimony of Dr. Schroeder.

Dr. Schroeder did not testify at the hearing on the gentleman's resolution that 6,000 children below the age of 5 years die every year in this country from bovine tuberculosis. Dr. Schroeder's testimony was to the effect that from an investigation in New York City as to deaths among children from bovine tuberculosis, it would appear that 10 per cent of the children that die from all kinds of tuberculosis in New York City are the victims of bovine tuberculosis, quite a different statement from the one attributed to Dr. Schroeder in the circular letter of the gentleman from Maryland.

The United States Mortality Tables for 1913, the 1914 report being not published as yet, revealed that approximately 325,000 babies under the age of 5 years die annually in this country from all diseases; and of that number 10,137 die from all forms of tuberculosis.

Assuming the investigation in New York City as to the deaths from tuberculosis among children to indicate, as Dr. Schroeder testified, that about 10 per cent of the children that die from all forms of tuberculosis die from bovine tuberculosis, it would appear that less than 1,200 babies under 5 years of age die in this country annually from bovine tuberculosis.

That 1,200 of the 325,000 children under 5 years of age that die annually in this country from all forms of disease are the victims of bovine tuberculosis is to be regretted, but that fact does not justify the gentleman from Maryland in sending broadcast over this land the statement that 6,000 babies below the age of 5 years die annually in this country from bovine tuberculosis, thereby magnifying the real situation 500 per cent.

The gentleman from Maryland in the preamble to his resolution, in his circular letters, and in his speeches made on his resolution has given out some stale and unfounded statements regarding the prevalence of tuberculosis among the dairy herds of this country.

In the preamble to his resolution the gentleman declared that a large percentage of the dairy herds of this country are affected with tuberculosis, and in his speeches on the floor of this House he stated that 20 per cent of the dairy cattle of the country were affected with tuberculosis, and also that tuberculosis was on the increase among the dairy herds of the country. Here again the gentleman from Maryland was handing out and spreading broadcast to the consumers of the dairy products of the country statements tending to alarm the consumers of the dairy products that were untrue and wholly without support by any recognized authority in this country.

At the hearing on his resolution the expert who had made an estimate a few years ago that 20 per cent of the dairy cattle of the country were affected with tuberculosis testified that after a more careful investigation he had found that only 9 per cent of the dairy cattle of the country were affected with tuberculosis, a difference of 2,400,000 in the number of the cattle affected.

The gentleman evidently aims to be sensational, and it is certainly more sensational to charge that 20 per cent of the dairy cattle of the country are affected with tuberculosis than to charge that only 9 per cent of them are so affected; and to send out broadcast the charge that 6,000 babies below 5 years of age are the victims of bovine tuberculosis each year in this country, instead of 1,000 or 1,200 babies, is more sensational and more likely to be effective in getting action from the club women of the country.

The statement of the gentleman from Maryland that tuberculosis among the dairy cattle of the country is on the increase is also without any authoritative basis on which to rest. At the hearing on the gentleman's resolution there was no evidence produced to warrant any such statement on this point. Dr. Melvin, Dr. Schroeder, Dr. Mohler, all experts of the Bureau of Animal Industry, were examined at that hearing and these gentlemen gave no such testimony.

If tuberculosis among the dairy herds of this country is on the increase, that fact can not be proven by the death rate from tuberculosis among the children of the country.

In 1911 in the registration area of the United States 6,680 children below the age of 5 years died from tuberculosis of all kinds, while in 1913, when the registration area comprised 10,000,000 more people, the number of children below the age of 5 years that died from all kinds of tuberculosis in this country was 6,623, a very marked decrease in two years, considering the increase of population involved.

My information is to the effect that the mortality statistics for 1914, which have not as yet been published, will also show a decreased death rate in children below the age of 5 years who die each year from all kinds of tuberculosis.

I have before me the recent reports from the veterinary departments of three of the great dairy States of the Union, Wisconsin and New York being the ranking States and Pennsylvania being sixth in line.

According to the report of the State of Pennsylvania, it appears that the percentage of cows tested and found to be affected with tuberculosis decreased from 14.6 per cent in 1908 to 6.8 per cent in 1915.

In New York the percentage of cows tested and found to be tubercular decreased from 14 per cent in 1911 to 6.7 per cent in 1915.

In the State of Wisconsin during the year 1915, 69,000 head of dairy cattle were subject to the tuberculin test, and of this number only 4.5 per cent reacted and were found to be tubercular.

The fact that the tuberculin test develops that a cow has tuberculosis does not necessarily indicate that that cow's milk will contain tubercle germs. Only a small percentage of cows affected with tuberculosis give milk containing tubercle germs.

There are two kinds of tuberculosis found among the dairy herds of the country—one kind is what is known as generalized tuberculosis and the other is localized tuberculosis. A cow may be affected with what is called localized tuberculosis and not be a menace to the health of those that may drink her milk.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REILLY. I yield to my colleague from Indiana.

Mr. CLINE. What does the gentleman mean when he says that tuberculosis localized is not a menace to the public health?

Mr. REILLY. Localized tuberculosis is the situation that arises when the disease is walled off, so to speak, and it does not affect the rest of the animal. The dairy cow that is affected with what is called localized tuberculosis may go on for years giving milk absolutely free from tubercle germs, while a cow affected with generalized tuberculosis would be liable to give milk at times containing tubercle germs.

Recent investigations indicate that the per cent of dairy cows affected with generalized tuberculosis is decreasing in proportion to the per cent affected with localized tuberculosis.

The report of the State of New York shows that in 1909 and 1910, out of 3,029 dairy cattle condemned, 1,685 were affected with localized tuberculosis and 1,240 with generalized tuberculosis; in 1912 and 1913, out of 2,891 dairy cows condemned, 1,949 were affected with localized tuberculosis and 581 with generalized tuberculosis; and in 1913 and 1914, out of 2,139 cattle condemned, 1,409 were affected with localized tuberculosis and 424 with generalized tuberculosis.

The results of the tests in New York, at least, would indicate that the dairymen are eliminating from their herds the cows affected with generalized tuberculosis.

The speeches of the gentleman from Maryland in support of his resolution are notable for his failure to give all the facts contained in the Bureau of Animal Industry report on which his resolution is based, and for his severe denunciations of almost every phase of the dairy industry.

The gentleman is very much disturbed over the practice of the dairymen in coloring butter. It is a bad, pernicious, injurious practice, he thinks, to color butter, and in order to cast suspicion on the purity of the coloring matter used by the dairy people in coloring butter the gentleman refers the gentle reader to a work on chemistry, intimating that an investigation of that work will reveal how injurious to health the practice is.

In the hearing on his resolution the gentleman proceeded to develop his theory as to the injurious effects on health of the coloring matter in butter, and for that purpose he interrogated Mr. Raul, Chief of the Dairy Division of the Department of Agriculture, as follows, but with results I hardly think he expected:

Mr. LINTHICUM. What coloring matter is now used, do you know [referring to the coloring of butter]?

Mr. RAUL. Well, that is a question that I am not in a position to answer. The inspection of coloring matter that goes into interstate commerce is a matter of the Bureau of Chemistry. I believe they have ruled out mineral coloring matter, but there is a vegetable coloring matter called "annatto" that is commonly used in coloring butter.

Mr. LINTHICUM. What is annatto?

Mr. RAUL. It is a plant from which the coloring extracts are taken.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is it healthy?

Mr. RAUL. Yes, sir; so far as it is known. I believe I am on the ground of the Bureau of Chemistry, but I believe the Bureau of Chemistry has passed upon it as entirely harmless, and it has been used for many years.

The gentleman from Maryland in his argument against the coloring of butter falls easily into the line of thought pursued by the advocates of oleomargarine in their attempt to prevent the enactment of legislation forbidding them to color their product the color of butter.

The oleomargarine manufacturers argue that if the farmer is permitted to color his butter at certain seasons of the year, then the manufacturers of oleomargarine should be allowed to color their product also at seasons of the year without interference from the law.

On the butter-coloring question I desire to quote from one of the great butter authorities of the United States, ex-Gov. W. D. Hoard, of Wisconsin, editor of Hoard's Dairyman. Mr. Hoard is one of the veterans in the dairy business, and has done much to make the dairy industry of the great Northwest what it is to-day, and he is well qualified to state the case in favor of the practice of coloring butter. He says:

When butter is made from the milk of cows grazing on grass it is yellow; certain breeds of cattle produce yellow butter the entire year, and certain combinations of feed produce yellow fat in winter, no matter what the breed may be, and under such conditions no color is needed to produce yellow butter. * * * Butter color is not made from impure and unhealthful products. The juice of carrots was used by our forefathers, and now the juice from the fruit of the annatto tree provides the material for making commercial butter color. * * *

Butter was colored by the good housewife on the farm long before there was a dairy industry or a creamery, and Congress has recognized color as an ingredient of butter. There may be consumers who do not know that butter is colored to give it a uniform shade of yellow. There are undoubtedly those who do not know that butter is made from the fat of cow's milk and that butter contains casein, milk sugar, ash, and water. It is not the fault of the butter manufacturer if the consumer does not know the composition of butter, nor does his ignorance make the use of color in butter a fraud any more than the use of salt is a fraud or a deception. If the natural color of butter were white, as is the case with oleomargarine, then some objections might be raised against the practice of coloring butter. Butter is colored to please the taste and to make it a uniform shade of yellow throughout the year, for under certain conditions, which we have mentioned, butter is a deep shade of yellow, and man can not help it. Yellow is the trade-mark of butter, and made so by nature. This, together with the long-continued practice of coloring butter, indicates that the use of color in butter is neither a fraud nor a deception. It is still butter, and never sells for anything but butter. Butter is not colored to make the consumer think it was made in June, for butter made in June and held in storage in winter is not as good as butter made in the winter. * * *

If butter were not put upon the market in a certain shade of yellow it would be misleading to the consumer. For years the consumer has been buying butter, colored yellow to suit his fancy, and if Congress had not by an enactment made color an ingredient of butter it would be so considered, because it has been used for a great many years. * * * The butter interests hold that yellow is not only a trade-mark of butter, but a demarcation for distinguishing butter from oleomargarine. Butter has a right to demand that oleomargarine be not colored in imitation of yellow butter. When oleomargarine is colored in imitation of yellow butter, fraud and deception follow. It is for this reason that the dairy interest demand that oleomargarine be sold in its natural color and not in the shade of yellow which is a trade-mark of butter. Color can not cover up impurities, flavors, or anything in butter that might be deleterious to health. If butter was a uniform shade of yellow the entire year, there would be no excuse for using any coloring matter.

The foregoing presentation of the butter-coloring proposition by ex-Gov. Hoard is a complete refutation of the arguments of the gentleman from Maryland, and the advocates of oleomargarine against the long-established practice of coloring butter at certain seasons of the year so as to give a uniform color to the product the year round.

The only difference between the dairyman coloring his butter and the oleomargarine manufacturer coloring his product is this: When the consumer purchases butter that has been colored he is getting what he bargained for, butter; while if oleomargarine can be colored the color of butter there would not be one purchaser in one hundred who would know when he bought something that looked like butter whether he was getting butter or something manufactured to be sold as butter.

The dairy interests of the country have no objection to the oleomargarine people being permitted to color their product providing the color used is such as will enable the purchaser and consumer to distinguish the manufactured substitute for butter from real butter.

There is a bill now pending before the Committee on Agriculture giving to oleomargarine manufacturers the right to color their product providing they use a color of such a shade as will make it possible for the purchaser to distinguish their product from real butter, but the oleomargarine manufacturers do not want such a law. They want the right to use one color in the manufacture of their product and that color is yellow, the trade-mark color of butter, because then they will have a chance to sell their product, not as oleomargarine, but as real butter of the cow.

At the present time the oleomargarine people can make their product in this natural color under a tax of one-quarter of a cent a pound, just enough to pay the expenses of the Government in supervising the manufacture of and sale of the article.

The dairy people do not ask for any special favors at the hands of Congress in the way of legislation favorable to their industry. All they ask is that their product be protected from the fraudulent competition of the concerns engaged in manufacturing substitutes therefor. They have no objection to the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine or any other product made as a substitute for butter, providing the product is so made that there will be no fraud or deception practiced upon the purchasing and consuming public.

In many States of the Union and particularly in Pennsylvania and Michigan colored oleomargarine is not permitted to be sold, and such legislation has the backing of the people. The proposition of coloring oleomargarine has been fought out in many of the State legislatures, and particularly in the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania. The Hon. James H. Maurer, president of the State Federation of Labor and for many years a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature, presents the following broad-gauged view on the proposition involving the coloring of oleomargarine:

For the past six years, or the three last legislative sessions of Pennsylvania, I opposed all proposed legislation which aimed to legalize the coloring of imitation butter by manufacturers or dealers. My objections are not based on any thought that coloring matter is unhealthful or that imitation butter is not fit for human consumption. My objection is solely an economic one. At present imitation butter in its natural state sells for from 18 to 22 cents a pound in Pennsylvania, while the genuine dairy product costs 36 cents a pound. The purer the imitation is the whiter it is. If the manufacturers and dealers in the imitation article were permitted to color their product, the imitation would be complete, so much so that nothing short of an analysis would reveal its component parts. This is at least true of the great majority of consumers.

The imitation article, therefore, like any other imitation which closely resembles the genuine, comes in direct competition with it. Once we allow it to be colored its price will begin to soar dangerously close to the real article, and, as a consequence, the consumer who is now buying oleomargarine or butterine for 20 cents a pound will pay the advanced price.

One thing sure, the farmer never could hope to compete with the manufacturer of the imitation article. As a result many of the dairy farmers would be compelled to go out of the dairy business and turn their farms to raising something else. And just as fast as this happens the price of the imitation article will rise until finally the great packing companies of the country will have a monopoly; then the consumer will pay more for the imitation article than we are paying for the genuine. Besides, the imitation will, most likely, not be as pure as it is now, if colored, because the purer the whiter, and the consumers know this. When colored, a certain amount of impure, foreign matter may be used and can not be detected by sight because of the coloring.

On the other hand, if the farmers can not find a profitable market for their milk and turn their farms to other products, it means the starving of their land, as fertilizers produced by cattle are the life of the soil.

Therefore, looking at the question from every angle possible, I can see but two reasons why some dealers and manufacturers want a law giving them the right to color their product in imitation of butter. One is to charge more for their product and the other is to give them a monopoly of the butter market

Let oleomargarine and butterine and all other substitutes stand on their own feet and sell for what they are and not for what their manufacturers can make people believe they are.

There can be no doubt at all but that if the oleomargarine manufacturers are permitted to color their product the color of butter the dairy industry of this country would be doomed. The American cow can not compete with the oleomargarine factory, and, as stated by Mr. Maurer, the consuming public would secure no benefits from the destruction of the dairy industry of this country. Butter consumers would then be compelled to pay as high a price for the bogus article as they have to pay to-day for the genuine article.

The dairy industry is the most important industry in our country to-day from the standpoint of the welfare of all our people. Our once virgin soil is rapidly being depleted of the essential requisites for large productive capacity, and in the cow to a large extent lies our hope to restore our exhausted soil and to make possible this country continuing as the great food storehouse of the world.

The gentleman from Maryland is agitated over the fact that some butter has too much moisture and again that the butter makers put too much salt in their product. Of course, it is rather difficult to understand just wherein the matter of moisture and salt in butter has any bearing on the gentleman's famous resolution. It would look very much as though he was out to give butter a black eye, and he overlooked nothing.

If the gentleman had investigated the butter question a little more thoroughly before he launched his propaganda, he would have learned that there is already a law on the statute books which takes care of the question of excess moisture in butter. The law already fixes the limit of moisture that butter can contain and be legally shipped in interstate commerce. The person who ships, in interstate commerce, butter containing more than 16 per cent moisture is liable to prosecution under the laws of the United States, and it is very doubtful if there is much butter that passes to-day into interstate commerce that contains more than the maximum amount of moisture permitted by law.

In regard to the charge the gentleman makes that butter is loaded with salt, a sufficient answer is to state that salt is put into butter to accommodate the taste of the consumer. Some consumers like more salt than others in their butter, and there are others who prefer to have their butter without any salt, so if the manufacturer of butter overloads his product with salt he is simply killing his own business, and there is very little danger of the public being imposed upon by the dairymen loading their butter with salt, notwithstanding the fears of the gentleman from Maryland on that point.

The gentleman in his speech in advocacy of his resolution did not limit himself to criticism of the butter business of the country, but he also indulged in some insinuations and unwarranted conclusions regarding the cheese industry of the country.

It would seem he thought that while at the task of indicting the milk and cream and butter products of the country he might just as well make a complete job of it and indict the whole dairy industry by including cheese also.

The gentleman referred to the fact that in 1881 our exports of cheese from this country amounted to 150,000,000 pounds annually and that our exports since that time had dwindled down and down until 1914 they had reached the level of only a few million pounds, the idea being to convey the impression to the cheese consumers of the country that American cheese is so inferior in quality and such an unsalable product that the foreigners will no longer eat it, and that we must find a market for our inferior cheese product in the United States alone.

Here again the gentleman from Maryland got hold of a few facts, jumped a long jump to an erroneous conclusion and sent the news broadcast throughout the length and breadth of this land that there was something wrong with American cheese, because the foreigners were not buying it as they had bought it in the good old days of long ago.

It is true that in 1881 we exported from this country 150,000,000 pounds of cheese, and that in 1914 we exported only a few million pounds. But what was the real cause of the decline in our export business? The cause assigned by the gentleman from Maryland that our cheese had deteriorated in quality and that the foreigner would no longer purchase it? Oh, no. The fact of the matter is we did not send as much cheese abroad in 1914 as we did in 1881 simply because we did not have the cheese to send and for the further reason that cheese has generally brought a higher price in this country than in the foreign countries.

In 1879 we produced in this country 243,000,000 pounds of cheese. This was about the time when our exports of cheese reached the high-water mark, and at this time our population was 50,000,000. In 1910, when our exports of cheese reached its low-water mark, we produced 320,000,000 pounds of cheese, and our population at that time numbered 92,000,000. Thus it will be seen that during this period of 30 years our population increased 84 per cent while our production of cheese increased only 31 per cent. In 1859 we produced 103,000,000 pounds of cheese a year and our population then was 31,000,000. In 1879 when we reached the high-water mark of our exports of cheese we produced 243,000,000 pounds, an increase during these 20 years in population of 61 per cent and in the production of cheese of 135 per cent.

During the 10 years following 1879, after which our cheese export business began to decline, our cheese production increased only 5 per cent while our population increased 25 per cent.

No other explanation is necessary to be offered as a reason for the decline of our cheese exports than the simple fact that we did not have the cheese to send abroad. The article was apparently so good that our people consumed practically all we were able to make and at a higher price than the American cheese maker could get for his product in a foreign country.

Here, again, the accusations and the insinuations of the gentleman from Maryland, as to the purity and wholesomeness of our American cheese products, are wholly unfounded and without any justification at all, in fact.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REILLY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Is it not a fact that the question of cheese is largely a matter of taste, and that the foreign buyer might reject our cheese for that reason because we have not catered to his taste?

Mr. REILLY. I will state to the gentleman that on that point I am not informed. I see a reasonable explanation for the decline in our exports of cheese in the fact that our production of cheese has not kept pace with our population and that the domestic price for our cheese has ruled higher than the foreign price. I think in the matter of our imports the question of taste has had considerable to do with the increase of cheese imports, inasmuch as the increase has been made up principally of Italian cheese and Swiss cheese. We make some very good Swiss cheese in this country, some people say, as good as is made in any place in the world; but notwithstanding that fact there are a great many people who prefer and will pay more for the foreign article, simply because it is a foreign article, and not because it is a better product.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REILLY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. While there may have been exaggeration of the number of babies who have died from impure milk, does not the gentleman believe that the governments of the States have been altogether justified in killing herds of cattle affected with disease?

Mr. REILLY. I have no doubt at all but that the different State governments and the United States Government are justified in slaughtering dairy cows for the purpose of eradicating tuberculosis from the dairy herds of this country. And I do not believe there will be any let-up by the different States in this work of applying the tuberculosis test to diseased cows affected with disease and of marking the same for slaughter. The dairy people are not objecting to the methods that are being employed by the various States and the United States Government to accomplish the eradication of bovine tuberculosis from the dairy herds of this country, and they encourage every movement along this line. I believe there has been great progress in practically all of the States of this Union in legislating with the end in view of stamping out this disease, and the dairymen themselves are rendering hearty cooperation to the different State authorities, because they realize that it is to their own interests that diseased cows be eliminated from their herds. The dairy business of to-day is being put upon a business basis, and the dairymen know better than anyone else that diseased cows are not profitable to have in their herds.

The State of Wisconsin has had since 1910 a most stringent law, written for the purpose of getting rid of tuberculosis in the dairy herds in that State. Under this law cows can not be sold or purchased for dairy purposes without having first been subjected to the tuberculin test, and in most of the States of the Union to-day cows can not be imported for dairy purposes unless they have been subjected to and stood the tuberculin test.

Mr. FOCHT. While you and I might resent interference with your State and mine, the statement made by the Secretary of Agriculture recently delivered is that the disease is spreading very extensively over Germany, that it is almost hopeless, and in all other countries except England it is spreading. The resolution might apply more strongly where they have not had regulations as they have in your State and mine.

Mr. REILLY. The resolution of the gentleman from Maryland has no application in any State of the Union to-day in my judgment. It was based on a report almost four years old, that dealt with only a small fraction of the creameries of the country, and since that time marked improvement has been made along lines that have lead to the production of better and more healthful dairy products.

On the hearing of the resolution of the gentleman from Maryland, it conclusively appeared that in the past four or five years great progress has been made in furnishing to the consumers of dairy products a better and more wholesome article.

The Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Houston, stated in a letter to the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. LINTHICUM, which letter was filed with the committee and became a part of the hearings that—

Nearly every State of the Union and most of the cities have statutes, ordinances, and regulations to control the milk supply, and dairy inspections are required by most of these regulations. The quality of milk supply for use in the fluid state has improved considerably within the past few years, due to better sanitary conditions at the dairy farms and more extensive use of pasteurization.

It is not contended that the dairy industry of this country has reached a stage of perfection, but it is contended that in recent years as much if not more progress in improved and better methods for safeguarding the purity of dairy products has been made as in any other industry in the country that has to do with the food supply.

The representatives of the dairy interests who appeared at the hearing on the resolution of the gentleman from Maryland informed the committee that at the present time at least 75 per cent of the cream used in making butter that goes into interstate commerce is pasteurized. These men contended and there was other evidence to substantiate their contention, that the pasteurization of milk and cream kills all germs, and that butter made from pasteurized cream would be free from any disease germs in the milk before same was pasteurized.

It is also a fact that to-day 75 per cent and 80 per cent of the milk supply of the large cities of the country such as Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, and Boston is pasteurized, a situation that did not exist several years ago.

In the recent years certified-milk dairies have been springing up all over the country, and uncertified dairies are being subjected to closer inspection and investigation by the health officers of the cities served with milk in fluid form. The State legislatures and common councils have been giving special attention in recent years to the matter of legislation designed to improve dairy products and make it possible to produce more wholesome dairy products.

The Wisconsin Legislature passed a law in 1915 requiring all cheese and butter makers operating factories in that State to be licensed by the State food and dairy commissioner. Under this law cheese and butter makers are not only required to secure a license from the State dairy and food commissioner but that official is also given the power to revoke any license issued to a butter or cheese maker who does not operate his factory in accordance with modern methods. Several States of the Union have recently passed laws requiring all butter made in factories to be made from pasteurized milk, and in every State of the Union except two it is impossible to import a cow for dairy purposes unless the animal has been subject to and has stood the tuberculin test.

It is safe to say that in the past five years more progress has been made along various lines having in view the raising of the standard of our dairy products than has been made in any 15 or 20 years in the history of our country.

On the question as to improved conditions of the dairies of our country I quote again from Hoard's Dairyman:

Dairy products are more wholesome now than they ever have been in the history of the dairy industry. In the past few years sanitary barn equipment companies have sprung up everywhere in the dairy sections, indicating that the dairy farmers desire to produce a better grade of milk. These companies could not have existed in the early days of dairying, as the average dairy farmer did not see the necessity of providing clean and wholesome surroundings for his cows. The demand for sanitary equipment for creameries has increased. There would not be a demand for better machinery and better equipment for our creameries, cheese factories, and milk concerns if the owners were not improving the quality and wholesomeness of dairy products. A few years ago milk or cream used for making butter was not pasteurized, but now the practice is very common, and each year finds a larger number of creameries pasteurizing both milk and cream. Within the past few years the big milk companies began to pasteurize milk for direct consumption, and now the cities like New York, Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, San Francisco, Washington, Milwaukee, and many others are well supplied with pasteurized or certified milk, and no one of necessity must use unwholesome milk. Inspection of the dairy farms is becoming more general and there has been a substantial improvement in the production of sanitary milk the past few years.

In a recent letter from the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. Carl Vrooman, he has something pertinent to say in reference to the report of the Department of Agriculture for 1912 and the general condition of the dairy industry of this country at the present time. I quote the following:

To begin with, this report was based upon an investigation made by the Bureau of Animal Industry over four years ago, the investigation having begun on April 10 and having ended June 30, 1912, before either Secretary Houston or I became connected with the Department of Agriculture. Furthermore, the report itself was based on an investigation of but 144 creameries and cream-buying stations out of a total of 6,000 creameries and some 40,000 cream-buying stations.

The Federal Department of Agriculture is completely out of sympathy with current misunderstandings and misinterpretations of the 1912 report. That report does not mean to say or to infer that the dairy industry is on a lower level or has lower standards of purity and cleanliness than the other industries of the country. If the department were to make out a score card for the different foods and drinks that are being produced and consumed throughout this country to-day, and especially for the vegetables, fruits, and other foods exposed for sale at the average market and grocery store, it would find that in a majority of cases similar conditions exist to those disclosed in the dairy industry.

I am not here to defend the tubercular cow, the insanitary dairy, or unclean dairy products of any kind; but I am here to protest against the wild, distorted, and unfounded charges made by the gentleman from Maryland against one of the great industries of our country.

I have the honor to represent in part upon the floor of this House the greatest dairy State in the Union. Wisconsin ranks first not only in the production of butter but also in the production of cheese. Out of the 22,000,000 head of dairy cattle in this country 1,600,000 are found on Wisconsin farms, and of the $1,000,000,000 annual dairy production of this country $100,000,000 worth of it goes to farmers in Wisconsin.

The gentleman from Maryland has had considerable to say about the so-called butter-revenue frauds. He makes no mention of oleomargarine-revenue frauds, and it would appear it was his purpose to cast onto the dairy industry of this country the odium of certain frauds committed by the bogus-butter manufacturers.

As to just what connection there is between bogus-butter revenue frauds and the improvement of the dairy conditions on the farm and in the creameries and butter factories of our country it is rather difficult to see; but I take it that the gentleman from Maryland must have seen some connection or he would not have strayed out of his way again to send out all over the country some more misleading statements liable to confuse the general public.

The gentleman from Maryland forgot even to mention in his speech the fact that the oleomargarine manufacturers had defrauded the Government in the past few years out of about $17,000,000 in taxes, and that during that time they had probably produced and offered for sale and sold as real butter more than 200,000,000 pounds of their bogus butter.

Of course, it would not be expected that the gentleman from Maryland would be deeply interested in the frauds committed on the public by the oleomargarine manufacturers. He was after the legitimate butter makers and he had no time for side issues.

A few weeks ago my colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE], who represents one of the greatest dairy constituencies of the country, saw fit to question the motives of the gentleman from Maryland in his attack on the dairy industry of the country. The gentleman from Maryland made another speech in answer to the remarks of my colleague, and in advocacy of his resolution, wherein he vehemently denied that he was representing in his attacks upon the dairy interests the oleomargarine manufacturers, and insisted he was actuated only by the purest motives in the drafting and introduction of his resolution. I acquit the gentleman from Maryland, in view of his statement, and I have no doubt but my colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE] will also acquit him, of an intentional desire to smite the dairy industry of this country to the great benefit of the oleo interests. The fact nevertheless remains that the gentleman from Maryland, in the framing of the misleading and false preamble to his resolution, in the speeches that he made in defense of the same, and in the propaganda that he carried on in sending his resolution and speeches all over the country containing false and misleading information as they did regarding the dairy interests of the country, has unintentionally or otherwise, and I freely concede unintentionally, become the greatest enemy of the dairy industry and the greatest friend of the manufacturers of oleomargarine that has appeared in the public for many years.

I fear that way back in the bushes somewhere, unknown to the gentleman from Maryland, there was located an oleomargarine nigger who kindly furnished the gentleman with the stale, sensational, misleading, and untrue information that caused the gentleman from Maryland to start his so-called pure-food propaganda.

It was stated at the hearing on the gentleman's resolution by a representative of the dairy industry that some time ago the dairy people had been informed by a gentleman in Chicago, who apparently was connected with the oleo business, that if the dairy people did not cease agitating for oleomargarine legislation—and, by the way, the law that the dairy people have been agitating for is a bill now pending before the Committee on Agriculture permitting oleomargarine to be made and colored provided the color used is such as to enable the consumer to distinguish real butter from the bogus product—that he was in a position to push a button that would upset the dairy industry of the country. Well, the button was pushed and the oleomargarine people have had the happiest days they have enjoyed in a long time since the gentleman from Maryland started out with his preamble and his resolution to swat the dairy interests right and left.

It may be that the vigorous and unrelenting campaign conducted by the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue in his enforcement of the revenue laws in relation to the manufacturer of colored oleomargarine has had something to do with the button-touching episode referred to, for it is a fact that never since the oleo laws were first written have the manufacturers of that product been so squarely put up against the proposition of obeying the law or going to the penitentiary.

Internal Revenue Commissioner Osborn is entitled to the thanks of the dairymen of the entire country for his untiring efforts to protect the products of the dairy farmer and the consuming public from the frauds practiced by the oleomargarine manufacturers. Prosecutions under the oleomargarine laws are now real and not farcical. There are no more attempts to settle revenue frauds mounting up into the millions for a few thousand dollars as under former administrations. The order has gone forth to ferret out and prosecute every violator of the law in the manufacture and sale of bogus butter, and, if possible, not to take a fine, but to land the malefactors behind the doors of the penitentiary.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, after the other speakers have concluded, I may have 45 minutes in which to address the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that following the order of speaking on Tuesday next he be permitted to address the House for 45 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is recognized for 30 minutes.

EXEMPTIONS FROM CIVIL SERVICE REGULATIONS.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, on the 13th of April I made some remarks in this House discussing facts which I found in the annual reports of the Civil Service Commission as to the persons for whom the President issued special Executive orders which exempted them from the regular requirements of the civil-service regulations. In the course of my remarks I commented upon a few of the cases, drawing my inferences solely from the facts as stated in the report of the commission. Soon after, I received the following letter from the Postmaster General:

APRIL 21, 1916.

Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. GILLETT: My attention has been called to your remarks made Thursday, April 13, on the floor of the House of Representatives with reference to the part I have had in connection with the issuance of certain Executive orders.

The following is quoted from your remarks:

"The fact that the Postmaster General had brought in with him two good men and had kept them in direct connection with his office was apparently sufficient reason to have the rules of the civil-service law set aside, so that his protégés might get permanent appointments. It is needless to say that the Civil Service Commission was not convinced by this statement and did not approve the appointments."

These two negro boys—of course, Republicans—were in the Postal Service, classified as laborers, when I became Postmaster General, one of them having been appointed in the Washington (D. C.) post office under date of February 25, 1902, and was transferred to the Post Office Department roll under date of January 26, 1907. The other was appointed a laborer December 21, 1903. They were rendering service in the office of the Postmaster General and fell under my immediate observation. They were both efficient and faithful in doing their work. They were already in the classified service, but under the law could not be paid more than $660 per annum. I thought they deserved an increase, and in order that justice be done, without any request from them or anyone else, I requested that they be classified as skilled laborers, so as to increase their pay to $720 per annum. Under date of April 23, 1915, the Executive order was issued.

As to the railway postal clerk, William R. Houston, mentioned by you, I would state that his case was originally brought to the attention of the department by the division superintendent of Railway Mail Service, at Fort Worth, Tex., in a letter in which it was stated that although the applicant was 56 years of age "he * * * is a very strong and healthy man and capable of still performing the hard physical work which might be required of him in the Railway Mail Service. His health seems to be perfect."

As stated in your remarks, this clerk was originally appointed in 1882. This was under the administration of President Arthur, and presumably he is a Republican, as you are no doubt familiar with the fact that appointments were made in the Railway Mail Service at that time only upon political indorsement.

With reference to the only other case accredited me and mentioned by you as censurable, I beg to say that the statement made by you is so indefinite that it does not enable me to identify the case, but I doubt not it is just such a case as these others.

It is due the Post Office Department that you correct the impression that has been created through your remarks to the effect that my action in the cases referred to was actuated largely, if not entirely, by partisan considerations, and I indulge the hope that you will make this correction in the RECORD. An honest investigation will disclose that under this administration in the Postal Service there has been shown as much, if not greater, regard for true civil-service principles than under previous administrations. You perhaps recall that an Executive order was issued in the closing days of the administration of President Taft classifying approximately 47,000 fourth-class postmasters without examination of any character. That political indorsements had been the primary requisites for appointment of these postmasters is, no doubt, better known to the individual Members of Congress than to anyone else. In keeping with that degree of efficiency which characterized this administration from its inception the President, upon my recommendation, issued an order requiring a civil-service test in the cases of these 47,000 fourth-class postmasters. This was a perfectly reasonable requirement, and the lack of this requirement appears to be the very thing you attempt to criticize with reference to certain isolated recipients of Executive orders issued during the incumbency of this administration.

As bearing further upon this department's policy, with respect to the civil service, and in marked contrast with the usual Republican practices, attention is invited to the report of the Postmaster General for the fiscal year 1914, wherein recommendation was made for the enactment of legislation which would permit of an Executive order placing third-class post offices—not postmasters—under the civil-service laws. In my report for the fiscal year 1915, this recommendation was renewed and extended so as to cover the second-class as well as the third-class offices.

Very sincerely,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

I answered this letter as follows:

MAY 1, 1916.

Hon. A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General, Washington D. C.

DEAR MR. POSTMASTER GENERAL: Your letter, dated the 21st, which you spoke to me on the 20th of having written, arrived at my office on the 24th in my absence at home. I am glad you called my attention to the matter, as I do not wish to do injustice on the floor of the House to any part of the administration, and least of all to you.

The first case you speak of is that of two unskilled laborers whom you appointed as skilled laborers. I see that I intimated that you brought them with you into the office, and in that I was obviously wrong, as you state that you found them there; but still those two laborers, who had come under your personal attention and who were not at all in the classified service, you had, against the protest of the commission, promoted into the classified service, where the law allows nobody to enter except by competitive examination. Admitting that they were, as you say, entitled to an increase, there were doubtless hundreds of others just as efficient and deserving who could only get it by succeeding in the competitive examination. Should the fact that these had come within the circle of your personal acquaintance and favor entitle them to promotion rather than others? It seems to me that comes precisely within the language I used, which was as follows:

"It seems to me that the cases show a deplorable laxity and easy willingness to oblige applicants, an introduction of favoritism and personal influence, which the civil-service laws and rules were intended to prevent and which is inconsistent with the professions of a believer in the civil-service principles."

The next case to which you allude is that of William R. Houston. In that case I criticized his appointment to the Railway Mail Service because of his age. You state that he is strong and healthy, but that he is 56 years of age. You and I, who were on the Committee on Appropriations, long ago were impressed with the danger that our service was undergoing because of the age of its members, and though a man of 56 may be strong, it seems to me he can not continue to be strong long enough to justify his entrance to the Railway Mail Service. It seems to me that it must have been personal interest and not the good of the service which prompted his appointment.

The third case, which you say you could not identify, I know of, like the others, only by the published statement of the Civil Service Commission. It was the case of Mr. James J. Harley, who was reinstated to a position in the post office in Philadelphia, where he was appointed June 1, 1893, and resigned in 1900. Those facts certainly would not justify the inference which you made in the case of Mr. Houston, that he was a Republican, but the statement which I quoted in my remarks clearly showed, it seemed to me, that it was a case of personal favoritism.

I do not suppose that you personally can be at all intimately acquainted with the cases in your department where you recommend that the civil-service rules be waived or that you know the precise motives which are behind those cases, any more than I suppose the President troubles himself to know the exact facts or motives behind the pressure which is brought on him, but it does not seem to me the facts you have put before me remove those cases justly from the criticism which I made and which I have quoted above. I am perfectly willing to state the facts which you gave me in the House, if you wish.

I have no doubt you personally are now, as I know you were in the House, a genuine believer in the usefulness of the civil-service rules. It seems to me, as I stated in my remarks, that the wisest way of conforming to them would be to accept as final the decision of the commission, in whose chairman, at least, I know you have full confidence, and I regret to find that you have been unwilling to abide by their decision.

Very sincerely, yours, F. H. GILLETT.

I have had some conversation with the Postmaster General on the subject since, when he said he expected to answer my letter and thought it was but fair that I should put the correspondence in the RECORD. Having heard nothing further from him, I now do this in compliance with his request.

Regarding the observance of civil-service principles by this Post Office administration, as referred to by the Postmaster General, I am compelled reluctantly to say that from the best information I can obtain I believe that the Post Office Department has sadly disregarded the spirit of the civil-service law in its appointments. In the Middle West, particularly, I am told that appointments not only of fourth-class postmasters but of rural carriers have been systematically managed and arranged in the most wanton defiance of civil-service principles and apparently for the purpose of giving places to "deserving Democrats."

To prove these facts by legal evidence is, of course, extremely difficult. That difficulty was illustrated by the recent telegram of the Secretary of Commerce to Judge Hughes. I have not the slightest idea that Mr. Redfield intended to make a false statement in saying that Mr. Durand's resignation was not forced. I have no doubt the facts were such that he thought that he could technically make that statement and still be truthful. But, comparing the statements of Mr. Redfield and Mr. Durand and taking into account the circumstances, I think few people will doubt that, whatever may have been the language which passed between them, Mr. Durand's resignation was not a voluntary one. Of course, in most cases it will be impossible to trace the exact facts, but if a Cabinet officer will make such a statement as that, the accuracy of which was only disproved because it was so conspicuous and because the person affected chanced to be neither unwilling nor afraid to speak, what denials can we not expect from subordinate officers whose sense of responsibility and whose accuracy and whose chance of detection are less than that of a Cabinet officer?

The difficulty of proving it is illustrated by the recent statement of the officers of the National Civil Service Reform League, of which Mr. Wilson was an officer when he was nominated for the Presidency. That organization is entirely nonpartisan, and yet the partisan manipulation of offices by this Post Office administration has been so notorious that they determined to investigate it, and in attempting to do so were at once balked by the secrecy with which the facts were covered and which the President refused to remove.

That the fourth-class postmasterships would be consigned to patronage and spoils was foreboded by a public statement of the Postmaster General on November 17, 1913, soliciting congressional recommendations in violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of section 10 of the civil-service law. Although this matter was brought to the personal notice of the President by the National Civil Service Reform League, no steps were taken by him to check the dangerous innovation of the Postmaster General. On the contrary, these acts were the mere prelude to invading with the spoils system the rural free delivery, a far more important branch of the service, embracing on June 30, 1915, 43,718 carriers, with average salaries of $1,098 each, as stated in the last report of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. The political debauchery of a portion of this most important branch of the service has been accomplished in the following manner:

A joint resolution of Congress extending the appropriation for the Postal Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, contains this proviso:

That, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, the pay of rural carriers who furnish and maintain their own motor vehicles and who serve routes not less than 50 miles in length may be fixed at not exceeding $1,800 per annum.

Nothing in this resolution seemed to contemplate the creation of any new service. It provided simply that the carrier—presumably those then in the service—who could furnish motor vehicles and serve routes not less than 50 miles in length might have their pay increased from $1,200, the former maximum, to $1,800. All those who had served the Government as rural carriers in the competitive classified service, if they performed their duties properly, had a peculiarly strong claim to retention, because they had all purchased their outfits, including the vehicles in which rural delivery was made, at their own expense, and some already were using motor vehicles. Great numbers had secured admission to the service by competitive methods, and unless they had failed in their duties they ought to be retained in their positions, so far as compatible with the establishment of the new system. If the Post Office Department had desired to do justice to its employees and to secure efficiency without regard to politics, it would have provided that the men already in the service who were efficient and properly performing their duties should be retained. Under this plan quite a number of the old carriers would be dropped, but the most desirable ones would remain. There should be no difficulty in any well-administered office in determining from comparative records of efficiency who should go or who should stay.

But the Post Office Department, seizing this joint resolution of Congress as a pretext for abolishing great numbers of rural routes and for creating a so-called new branch of the service, named "motor rural carriers," proceeded to make a clean sweep of many hundreds of positions in the competitive classified service, turning out all the incumbents, no matter how well they had performed their duties, and appointing new men by means of a so-called new examination by the Civil Service Commission, the eligible lists from this new examination being turned over to Congressmen for recommendations in the same manner as had been done in the case of fourth-class postmasters. For this purpose it was necessary to circumvent the judicial policy of the Civil Service Commission, and the manner in which this was accomplished is disclosed in a letter written by James K. Blakeslee, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, to the Hon. FRANK PARK, a Member of the House of Representatives from Georgia, dated December 9, 1915, and published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD December 15, 1915, pages 297 and 298. In this letter Mr. Blakeslee says:

The Civil Service Commission hold that a motor route is a new rural-delivery route, and whenever a new rural-delivery route is authorized or established an examination is held to secure eligibles, regardless of whether an existing eligible register is available or not. Therefore a new examination of all applicants for rural-route carriers was decided upon by the commission.

The compensation of a rural-route carrier requiring delivery by motor vehicles ranges from $1,500 to $1,800 a year. This compensation being materially greater than that of a route permitting delivery otherwise than by motor vehicles, it was held that it was necessary to hold a separate examination and maintain a separate register of eligibles for vacancies on motor routes, it not being permissible under the competitive requirements of the law to make certification from a register to a position with a materially higher compensation than that for which such a register was established.

Here is an adroit effort to create a situation to justify this clean sweep of rural-delivery carriers and then to throw the whole responsibility for this unjust proceeding upon the Civil Service Commission. The above paragraph is a verbatim copy of part of paragraph 2 of "Instructions to Applicants for the Rural Carrier Examination," issued August, 1913, by the Civil Service Commission, Form 1977, but the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General has cunningly omitted the sentence just preceding:

An appointing officer is privileged to fill any vacancy either by promotion or through open competitive examination held by the commission. For vacancies on motor rural-carrier routes the Post Office Department has requested the commission to certify eligibles from open competitive examination.

It was these omitted words which show that the responsibility for this clean sweep in the classified service rests in the first instance with the Post Office Department.

And that department can not justify itself by the pretension that this new examination was necessary because of the "materially higher compensation." The joint resolution of Congress did not fix the salary at $1,500 or $1,800. The Postmaster General might fix it himself and make it as low as he pleased. Indeed, many of the old carriers were actually using motor vehicles on their routes, which they were serving at their old salaries of $1,200 a year. Hence this "materially higher compensation" thus established by the Postmaster General himself was used as a pretext for something which he desired and which was otherwise unnecessary. There was no need whatever of making certifications for any new places from any eligible list. All that had to be done was to promote the men already in the service. No new examination by the commission was necessary for this at all. The commission bases its decision to hold new examinations when new eligibles are demanded on the theory that a place which may pay $1,800 will bring into the examination a higher class of men than a $1,200 place, and I have no doubt they are entirely judicial and impartial in their decision.

A peculiarity in making certifications for these motor routes renders it particularly easy to cover up political motives in making selections. Each county is considered the unit in holding examinations and making up the eligible lists. Now, the normal rule in other civil-service examinations is that the three highest men on the list are to be certified and the appointment must be made from these three. But an exception is made in the case of these rural carriers. Instead of certifying the three highest names, the commission certifies the names of the two highest in the county and adds a third name, the highest in the town from which the particular rural route starts where the carrier is to be appointed. The man selected may be in fact the very lowest of all those who have passed the examination, but if there happens to be no higher from his particular town or on his particular route, he may still be appointed. If the selection then were left in the hands of the Member of Congress from the district, such Member may take his choice from the two highest in the county, or he may choose the man from the locality, however low he may stand upon the county list, and it is precisely by this kind of manipulation that the Congressman can always excuse himself by saying, if he chooses the single man, that it was in deference to the local desires of these little towns, or, if he chooses one of the higher men from the county at large, that it was on account of his superiority in passing the examination.

Now, it was just this sort of political manipulation which the civil-service law was enacted to prevent. The men who framed that law knew how strong was the influence of Members of Congress upon the various departments which depended upon Congress for their appropriations and their very existence. It was realized that if the department had its choice of one out of three that choice would still be a political one if it depended on the recommendations of Congressmen. Therefore, section 10 of the law provided:

No recommendation of any person who shall apply for office or place under the provisions of this act which may be given by any Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, except as to character or residence of applicants, shall be received or considered by any person concerned in making any examination or appointment under this act.

To turn over the eligible lists to the Congressman of the district for his recommendation is to make these places patronage offices, to make the carriers political agents and retainers of the Congressman who recommends them and practically to throw this branch of the service back again into the spoils system. These rural carriers are peculiarly valuable to Congressmen in their political work. No one else is in such close touch with the farmers as the rural carriers, and to organize this force in support of some particular Congressman in many cases is to secure his election. In this case, indeed, the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General declared:

The law specifically limits the inquiry of this department to the character and residence of the applicants, and we may not make inquiry nor accept or receive any other data or information regarding an applicant. But—should the relative standing of the applicants be the same, the department would, of course, give preference to that eligible whom the Representative from the district believed would make the most efficient postal employee, naturally feeling that he would have the most reliable information.

He admits in this sentence that he would consider the recommendation of the Congressman as to efficiency, and this is precisely the thing which the department is forbidden to do, since the law realized that the recommendation would not be impartial, but that the Representative would often recommend his own man. Moreover, no one in his senses will believe that where the entire eligible lists have been handed over to Congressmen for their manipulation and advice the recommendations will be confined to cases where two men stand exactly equal. The manifest purpose of Mr. Blakeslee's letter is to plead a literal conformity with the law, the substance and spirit of which is flagrantly violated.

Mr. Blakslee pretends that the real object of the examination is not to get the old men out and put new men in, and says the old men are favored because "the commission determined that applicants who had served in the position of regular rural carrier should be given additional credit in the examination." How fair! But how much should it count? The commission announced: "There will be added to the general average attained in the examination a credit of one-half of 1 per cent for each year's experience, not exceeding a total of six years of such experience, or a maximum of 3 per cent." Frankly it would be more decent to have allowed nothing. For according to the rules for rating arithmetic announced by the commission (see Form 1977, p. 10) a single error of wrong or omitted punctuation or a fraction in the answer not reduced to the lowest terms deducts from 5 to 10 per cent. Arithmetic counts as 20 per cent of the whole in examinations for rural carriers (see p. 8), therefore a single wrong or omitted punctuation or a fraction if correct yet not reduced to the lowest terms will deduct from 1 to 2 per cent, while a whole year's experience in faithful work counts for one-half of 1 per cent only! Thus it would require from two to four years' experience to make up for that omitted punctuation, and no amount of past faithful experience could atone for two or three such mistakes. But comment can not add to the irony of this method of covering up the process by which a great branch of the classified service is again consigned to patronage and spoils.

To see how this method works in practice, I will cite an illustration given me by a friend for whose accuracy I will vouch and which I presume is typical. There are several rural routes starting from his city. The majority of the carriers on these routes were Republicans and had been in the service more than five years. When it was announced that new rural routes were to be established, the Democratic postmaster, who had received his appointment on the recommendation of the Democratic Congressman from the district, had a conversation with one of the carriers in which the postmaster stated that Democrats ought to be in those places, and that he would do what he could to get them there. The postmaster showed my friend letters from the Post Office Department instructing him to discontinue certain routes, naming the carriers who were to be discontinued and establishing some new motor routes instead.

The postmaster further informed him that after the examination for motor carriers for these new routes had been held, and the eligible lists had been prepared, the Congressman came to him with these eligible lists and conferred with him as to which of the men certified in each case should be given the place. As a result of these conferences and of the Congressman's recommendations men were selected who were all Democrats.

The turning out of the old carriers has worked great hardships. They have lost, without any fault of their own, their free-delivery wagons and equipment for which they paid their own money. One of them was using a motor vehicle for his delivery. It recalls some of the worst evils that prevailed under the spoils system before the civil-service law was passed.

Moreover, it is saying to the Government employees, "No matter how well you behave or how faithfully you perform your duties you can not remain if the political interests of some Congressman demand a change." This is a poor stimulus to efficient service. All these dismissed carriers received from the Government a little book of Instructions in the Conduct of the Rural Free Delivery Service, in which section 2 states "Politics or religious affiliations of applicants are given no consideration, nor are political indorsements entertained. The merit and qualifications of the applicant and the good of the service are alone considered." Section 17 states: "A rural carrier will not be removed except upon written specific charges filed with the Post Office Department, of which he shall have full notice, nor until he has had an opportunity for defense." Can these carriers be blamed if, under these circumstances, they consider these assurances of their Government a hollow mockery?

I do not accuse the Postmaster General of being personally responsible for the conditions in his department. I appreciate that with his two duties of distributing patronage and conducting the business of that great organization, he does not have time for petty details. But he is responsible, as is the President, for what happens in his department, and it is my genuine belief that in some parts of the country there has been a deliberate and organized disregard of the civil-service spirit which has no precedent in recent times.

It was in this same speech of mine, which the Postmaster General criticized, that I compared the records of President Wilson and President Taft in making appointments by Executive order, and substituting favoritism for the regular methods of appointment. It was easy for Mr. Sweet, the Acting Secretary of Commerce, to contradict the statements of Judge Hughes, which he said were founded upon my remarks, when the newspapers had mistakenly attributed them all to the Geodetic Survey, which Judge Hughes had been discussing just before. The fact that they occurred in other branches of the service and not in the Geodetic Survey makes them no less censurable. But I observe that Mr. Sweet has made no criticism of their accuracy since the newspaper confusion was cleared up. He could not, for my facts were taken from the public reports of the commission.

I notice that a newspaper which is generally so well informed in civil-service matters as the New York Evening Post, in an editorial on Judge Hughes's criticism of the administration for these Executive appointments, while admitting that the criticism is just and that the appointments were censurable, says that President Wilson has been no worse in the matter than were his predecessors, Presidents Roosevelt and Taft. In that the Post is entirely mistaken.

President Wilson up to April 1, 1916, appointed 241 persons by special Executive order exempting them from the civil-service requirements. President Taft, during the same period of his administration, only excepted 133, a little more than half as many. But that does not at all measure their relative adherence to the spirit of the civil service. President Roosevelt inaugurated the custom that when anyone requested him to waive the civil-service requirement in order to give a person an appointment the matter should be referred to the Civil Service Commission, and they should report upon the wisdom of the action. That, it seems to me, was a very sensible and disinterested innovation. The Civil Service Commission in such a case would be expected to sit as a judicial body, uninfluenced by political or partisan views, and forming its conclusions simply for the good of the service, and it seems to me the report of that commission ought to be conclusive to a President who wished to act for the country at large and not for his own personal or political gain. And it seems to me the genuineness of a President's devotion to the merit system could be very well measured by his acceptance or rejection of the recommendations of the commission in such cases. President Wilson excepted 38 without referring them at all to the Civil Service Commission and President Taft 12, a third as many. In both cases I assume that the reason they did not refer them to the commission for report was that they thought the report would be adverse, and so I censure them all, but President Taft sinned only a third as often as President Wilson.

Taking up the cases which were exempted after reference to the commission, President Wilson referred 203, President Taft 121. Of President Wilson's 203 the commission approved the appointment of 63 and disapproved the appointment of 140, so that in more than two-thirds of the cases President Wilson issued the order and made the exception against the advice of his commission. Of President Taft's 121 cases the commission approved the appointment of 103 and disapproved the appointment of 18, so that in only one-sixth of the cases did President Taft issue the order against the advice of the commission, as compared with two-thirds by President Wilson. How can any impartial person say that President Wilson was following the example of his predecessor? In relatively a few cases—a small minority—did President Taft fail to follow the opinion of the commission, while in a great majority of the cases President Wilson acted against the opinion of the commission. In one case, to abide by their decision was the rule; in the other case it was the exception. I hope President Hughes will set a new standard and never depart from the advice of the commission.

It should be borne in mind, moreover, that President Wilson had a commission of his own appointees, for one of his first acts was to introduce politics into the formation of the commission and make over the board, while Presidents Roosevelt and Taft both permitted the board to remain, during their terms, two Democrats and one Republican—so their deference to the opinion of the board can not be attributed to any political sympathy or subservience on the part of the board.

I have examined the exceptions which President Wilson has made since April 1, when I made my last speech on the subject, and I find that he is continuing the same custom of overruling the opinion of his Civil Service Commission. Since April 1, up to August 8, he has authorized the appointment of 52 persons outside of the regulations of the civil service. Of these 52 the Civil Service Commission approved 8 and disapproved 44, so that here more than four-fifths of them all were appointed in disregard of the opinion of the commission. It seems to me that the President's action in making these Executive orders has been akin to his action in all cases where the merit system was involved. He has approved the numerous measures adopted by Congress to narrow its scope, and this is the first administration since the civil-service law was enacted in 1883 which has limited and not extended its spirit and its influence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] is recognized for one hour.

MEXICO.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, nothing that President Wilson has done or tried to do since he took the oath of office is more worthy of study than his policy toward the Republic of Mexico. I have never been able to agree with those who say that the President has had no Mexican policy. If not a well-defined policy, he has had at least a well-known attitude, an evident and enduring purpose. He has constantly attempted to exercise a paternal oversight, a benevolent despotism, in Mexico for the advancement of what he believes to be the cause of constitutional government there; but his policy has been very costly to American citizens, whose lives and property have not been protected. It has been most unwelcome to the people of Mexico who have no faith in its benevolence and resent its despotism. Its advancement has been attempted by methods which ought not to have our approval and which have diminished our prestige and our influence among the nations of the world.

Mr. Wilson had been President of the United States only seven days when, on March 11, 1913, he announced his policy in a statement which Secretary Bryan telegraphed the next day to the diplomatic officers of the United States in all the principal Latin-American Republics. I quote the essential paragraphs:

> One of the chief objects of my administration will be to cultivate the friendship and deserve the confidence of our sister republics of Central and South America and to promote in every proper and honorable way the interests which are common to the peoples of the two continents.
> We hold, as I am sure all thoughtful leaders of republican governments everywhere hold, that just government rests always upon the consent of the governed and upon the public conscience and approval. We shall look to make these principles the basis of mutual intercourse, respect, and helpfulness between our sister republics and ourselves. We shall lend our influence of every kind to the realization of these principles in fact and in practice, knowing that disorder, personal intrigue, and defiance of constitutional rights weaken and discredit government and injure none so much as the people who are unfortunate enough to have their common life and their common affairs so tainted and disturbed. We can have no sympathy with those who seek to seize the power of government to advance their own personal interests or ambitions.
> We are the friends of peace, but we know that there can be no lasting or stable peace under such circumstances.
> From these principles may be read so much of the future policy of this Government as it is now necessary to forecast.

These words were ominous. What Latin American Government was there which at that time needed to be warned that we could have no sympathy with revolutionary movements growing out of unworthy personal motives? What Latin American Government needed the warning that—> we are the friends of peace, but we know that there can be no lasting and stable peace under such circumstances.

We have now in Nicaragua a force of the United States Marine Corps protecting Americans from the violence of the turbulent and disorderly elements of that country; a much stronger force of the Marine Corps is in Santo Domingo protecting a president who came into power by means of a successful revolution; we have in Haiti a force of marines amounting now or very recently to more than seventeen hundred officers and enlisted men, who are "preserving tranquillity" there, and for the second time we have an army in Mexico which lately amounted to more than 12,000 soldiers of all arms, who were sent there, President Wilson said, to "give friendly aid to the constituted authorities of Mexico" in capturing Villa, and who were to have "scrupulous respect for the sovereignty of that Republic."

There are, therefore, no less than four Latin American Republics in which armed forces of the United States are maintained in active service at the present time. It is plain enough, however, that in March, 1913, when President Wilson announced the principles that would control his policy, neither Nicaragua nor Haiti nor Santo Domingo was brought to the attention of the reader by the warning. Events then recent in Mexico had called forth many an anxious inquiry as to the attitude of the new administration toward this nearest of our Latin American neighbors. It was Mexico, and Mexico alone, that was understood to have been warned by the President of the United States of the terms on which lasting and stable peace could be maintained.

Less than a month before Francisco Madero had been President of Mexico. On March 18 his power was taken from him. He resigned or was deposed. Pedro Lascurain, the minister of foreign affairs, succeeded him, but remained in office only long enough to appoint Gen. Huerta to that post in the cabinet, which, according to Mexican law, made him next in succession. Mr. Lascurain then resigned the presidency and was succeeded by Gen. Huerta. A few days afterwards Madero was slain, and there were many who believed that Gen. Huerta was responsible for his death. The American ambassador investigated the affair and reached the conclusion that Gen. Huerta "was in no way privy to the killing of Madero." President Wilson was reported to be of the contrary opinion, and it was commonly believed that he referred to Huerta when he announced:

> We can have no sympathy with those who seek to seize the power of government to advance their own personal interests or ambitions. We are the friends of peace, but we know there can be no lasting or stable peace under such circumstances.

And added:

> From these principles may be read so much of the future policy of this Government as it is now necessary to forecast.

It was not long until this belief was confirmed and people began to sum up President Wilson's attitude in the curt phrase, "Huerta must go." Huerta, however, was not willing to go.

For a time he was confirmed in his belief that he might continue to be President of Mexico without the consent of the President of the United States by the fact that one after another the great powers of the world recognized his government. Germany, Great Britain, France, Austria-Hungary, Italy, and Japan—all the so-called great powers, except the United States—recognized Huerta as President of Mexico, and so did Norway, Spain, Denmark, Holland, and other Governments. Several of the South American Republics refrained from granting formal recognition, but it was said they did so at the request of the United States.

From the first some of the States of northern Mexico which touch upon the American boundary refused to submit to Huerta's authority. There and in territory to the south, where Zapata remained in rebellion, even as in the days of Madero and Porfirio Diaz, civil war raged. Especially in the north much American property was destroyed and many American citizens suffered personal indignities, injury, or loss of life.

After five months of watchful waiting, on August 3, 1913, President Wilson sent to Mexico City, as his personal spokesman and representative, John Lind, who was authorized to present to Huerta certain demands on the part of the President of the United States. These demands were four: The first was that the civil war in Mexico must cease at once; a very desirable thing, but who could promise it, or promising, had power to make his promise good? The third was that Gen. Huerta must get out, and must bind himself not to be even a candidate for the Presidency. Here are the four demands in the language in which President Wilson reported them to Congress on August 27, 1913:

(a) An immediate cessation of fighting throughout Mexico, a definite armistice solemnly entered into and scrupulously observed.
(b) Security for an early and free election in which all will agree to take part.
(c) The consent of Gen. Huerta to bind himself not to be a candidate for election as President of the Republic at this election.
(d) The agreement of all parties to abide by the results of this election and cooperate in the most loyal way in organizing and supporting the new administration.

President Wilson reported to Congress that the authorities in Mexico had rejected these proposals, and in doing so, had rejected our friendship. He continued:

We can not thrust our good offices upon them. The situation must be given a little more time to work itself out in the new circumstances; and I believe that only a little while will be necessary. For the circumstances are new. The rejection of our friendship makes them new and will inevitably bring its own alterations in the whole aspect of affairs.
* * * The steady pressure of moral force will, before many days, break down the barriers of pride and prejudice and we shall triumph as Mexico's friends sooner than we could triumph as her enemies—and how much more handsomely, with how much higher and finer satisfactions of conscience and of honor.

Though at this time, August 27, 1913, the President thought that we could triumph as Mexico's friends sooner than we could triumph as her enemies, the tone and temper of his annual address at the opening of Congress in December of the same year indicated that he was beginning to contemplate the possibility of such action as was not actually taken until the following April. In that address he said:

There can be no certain prospect of peace in America until Gen. Huerta has surrendered his usurped authority in Mexico; until it is understood on all hands, indeed, that such pretended governments will not be countenanced or dealt with by the Government of the United States. * * * Little by little he has been completely isolated. By a little every day his power and prestige are crumbling and the collapse is not far away. We shall not, I believe, be obliged to alter our policy of watchful waiting.

This statement that there could be no certain prospect of peace in America until Gen. Huerta had surrendered his usurped authority in Mexico should be read in connection with what the President on March 11, nine months earlier, had called the forecast of his future policy, and in which he had spoken of the conditions on which lasting or stable peace could be expected. He thought the collapse of Huerta's power was coming soon, and therefore believed we should not be obliged to alter our policy of watchful waiting. The implication is plain that if the collapse did not come soon he might find it necessary to try something more effective than that steady pressure of moral force which, in August, he had thought would bring the result before many days.

And yet the moral force had been made to show a steadily increasing pressure. At first there was the announcement of strong disapproval in the statement which President Wilson called a forecast of his future policy. Huerta was not much disturbed by this. The great powers of the world, aside from the United States, had recognized him and his financial credit was good.

On June 3, 1913, the London Standard announced that a Mexican loan had been arranged and apportioned among the financial capitals of Europe and America. The total amount of the loan was not announced, but the sum of $30,000,000 was to be apportioned among the following financial houses: In New York, J. P. Morgan & Co., Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and the City National Bank; in London, Morgan, Grenfel & Co.; in Berlin, the Bleichroder Group; in Paris, the Banque de Paris and the Payes-Bas Group.

That this was not a mere rumor was confirmed on June 24, 1913, when the Paris banks put on the market fourteen and a half millions of the new Mexican bonds at the very respectable price of 98. They explained that these bonds were guaranteed by 38 per cent of the Mexican customs. A good market was anticipated, particularly in those countries where the Huerta government had been recognized. Señor de la Garza, Huerta's diplomatic agent in the United States, said that the total amount of the loan accepted by these banking houses was $100,000,000. Huerta's credit was good in June, 1913.

Six months later, when the world began to realize President Wilson's determination that Huerta must go, the situation changed. John Lind had done his work in Mexico and the President's message of August 27 had announced the result. The great bankers had read the President's message of December 2, in which he said: "There can be no certain prospect of peace in America until Gen. Huerta has surrendered his usurped authority in Mexico." When the bankers of London and Paris and Berlin realized the real meaning of these utterances Huerta's credit was not so good. On December 10 he asked the same banks which had taken up the loan in the spring for an advance of $6,000,000 to meet the interest payments on the Mexican National Railway bonds. This advance was to come out of the unabsorbed portion of the original loan. On December 21 it was reported that the Paris banks, although they were reluctant to do so, had agreed to advance their proportionate share, but no more.

Other efforts were made afterwards by Gen. Huerta to secure further advances, but his efforts met with no encouragement. His credit was gone. Two influences had combined to produce this result, the influence of Gen. Carranza and the influence of President Wilson. The chief of the Constitutionalist faction in Mexico had warned the world that if he should ever come into control of the Mexican Government he would not recognize as bonds of the Mexican Republic the obligations which Gen. Huerta was now incurring. It was, of course, well understood that in case such bonds were repudiated by Mexico the United States would not look with favor upon any attempt of a foreign government to force Mexico to pay either the principal or the interest. The effect, of course, was to destroy the borrowing power of the Huerta government.

There were still other means of bringing pressure to bear—"the steady pressure of moral force"—which, it was hoped, would break down the power of Gen. Huerta; and President Wilson had been making use of it more or less steadily. In the special message of August 27, 1913, the President said to Congress:

I deem it my duty to exercise the authority conferred upon me by the law of March 14, 1912, to see to it that neither side to the struggle now going on in Mexico receive any assistance from this side of the border. I shall follow the best practice of nations in the matter of neutrality by forbidding the exportation of arms or munitions of war of any kind from the United States to any part of the Republic of Mexico—a policy suggested by several interesting precedents and certainly dedicated by many manifest considerations of practical expediency. We can not in the circumstances be the partisans of either party to the contest that now distracts Mexico or constitute ourselves the virtual umpire between them.

We will pass for the present this strange declaration of impartiality and consider the announcement of an embargo on munitions of war. This was a reassertion of a policy which was at that time generally believed to have been in force from the days of the Taft administration. I wish to call attention, however, to a telegram which had been received by the authorities in Washington on August 23, from a firearms company in El Paso. It read as follows:

We sold to-day to the Mexican Federal Government 320 rifles and 97,000 cartridges to assist in filling an order for 1,000 rifles and 500,000 cartridges, for which amount a permit had been issued at Washington and received here Thursday night. Some of the arms and ammunition crossed to Juarez, Mexico, to-day. We are told that no shipment of arms or ammunition allowed to Mexico. If permits allowed, can we secure permit to export a few carloads of arms and ammunition to the Constitutionalists?

This firm had evidently applied for permits before and had been told that shipments were not allowed. It had only learned that, on the contrary, permits were sometimes issued when it was applied to for assistance in filling out an order which a competitor was shipping into Mexico under a permit. In explanation of this telegram and of press dispatches from El Paso, which made the matter public, the authorities in Washington said that the permit in question had been issued in accordance with the regular practice and at the request of the Mexican embassy, and that it was the first permit that had been issued since June 25. Evidently, up to August 23, the date of this telegram, the administration had not been following that course which the President said on August 27 was the "best practice of nations in the matter of neutrality." As further evidence of the suddenness of the change of policy on the part of the administration, I may refer to a press telegram in the New York Times of August 28, which announced that 50,000 rifle cartridges were held up at El Paso by Government officials. The shipment reached there August 26, but was not taken by the Mexican Federal authorities at Juarez until the permit was revoked.

From this time on, however, arms and ammunition were not shipped into Mexico through the ordinary channels of trade. Gun-running expeditions were frequently undertaken and were sometimes successful, although the military forces along the international boundary were making the embargo as effective as they could by means of an energetic patrol covering those parts of the border which experience had shown them were likely to be chosen for such smuggling operations.

It is to be observed that the new policy made no change in the situation of the Constitutionalists. They had not been allowed at any time to receive open shipments of arms or ammunition. It was only the Federal authorities in Mexico, strange to say—Huerta's people—that had been allowed to receive such shipments previous to the President's announcement of an impartial embargo on August 27. After that announcement, Gen. Carranza, knowing the disfavor into which the Huerta government was sinking deeper and deeper, began to hope that permits might yet be issued for the sale of arms and ammunition to the Constitutionalists while the embargo would hereafter be maintained against Gen. Huerta and his forces. On November 7 Carranza asked for arms, and said that if his request were granted he could conquer Huerta and make peace in Mexico in three months. A week later William Bayard Hale, another personal representative of President Wilson, was in conference with Carranza at Nogales. The nature of the conference was not announced, but the New York Times correspondent expressed the belief that the subject under discussion had something to do with the guaranties that Carranza would be expected to make if arms should be furnished him.

It was not, however, until February 3, 1914, that the embargo was lifted. The President on that date issued a proclamation revoking the embargo proclamation which had been nominally in force ever since it was issued by President Taft on March 14, 1912. As reasons for this change of policy President Wilson said that the conditions on which the embargo proclamation had been issued had essentially changed, and further that it was desirable to place the United States in the same position as other powers with reference to the exportation of arms and ammunition of war to Mexico.

Together with the proclamation which lifted the embargo the President issued a statement which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] quoted on August 8 in his speech defending the President's Mexican policy. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Aug. 8, 1916, p. 12323.) A paragraph from President Wilson's very interesting statement reads as follows:

> The Executive order under which the exportation of arms and ammunition into Mexico is forbidden was a departure from the accepted practices of neutrality, a deliberate departure from those practices under a well-considered joint resolution of Congress, determined upon in circumstances which have now ceased to exist.

It is interesting to compare this statement with the declaration in the President's special message to Congress August 27, seven months earlier, when he announced his intention of enforcing the embargo impartially. I quote one sentence:

> I shall follow the best practice of nations in the matter of neutrality by forbidding the exportation of arms or munitions of war of any kind from the United States to any part of the Republic of Mexico.

Can any one, speaking with authority, tell us which of these statements President Wilson now believes to be true? Is an embargo on arms and munitions of war "a departure from the accepted practices of neutrality," or is it "the best practice of nations in the matter of neutrality"? When he wished to enforce the embargo it was the best practice of nations in the matter of neutrality. When he wished to lift the embargo, then it was a departure from the accepted practices of neutrality. I fear this matter must remain in doubt; for when the President again issued an embargo proclamation, as he did on the 19th of last October, he did not tell us whether he was then following or departing from the accepted practices of neutrality.

As might have been expected, President Wilson's proclamation of February 3, 1914, lifting the embargo was greeted in various quarters with varying degrees of approval or disapproval. A signed comment of Gen. Francisco Villa was sent out from Juarez, Mexico, which reads:

> JUAREZ, MEXICO, February 3, 1914.
> Raising the embargo on arms is an act of justice on the part of the American Government toward the people of Mexico and signifies the prompt pacification of the Republic. Within three months the war will have ended.
> Gen. FRANCISCO VILLA.

The unprejudiced comment of intelligent foreign observers has been said by some one to be a contemporary expression of the opinion of posterity. An influential London newspaper said of the raising of the embargo:

> The expedient of sanctioning and supporting civil war in a neighboring State is a declaration of war in a form which can hardly be reconciled with the comity of nations. The danger of the situation from the point of view of the United States is that there is no retreat with honor from the uncompromising if impracticable position which President Wilson has taken up.

Its effect upon Americans in Mexico, and especially upon one in the City of Mexico who was familiar with the government of President Huerta, is interestingly shown in the intimate letters written by Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, the wife of the American chargé d'affaires in Mexico, to her mother:

> To-night has come the long-feared cable from Washington stating that the President intends to raise the embargo on arms and ammunition. * * * This act will not establish the rebels in Mexico City or anywhere else, but will indefinitely prolong this terrible civil war and swell the tide of the blood of men and women "and the children—oh, my brothers!"
> I keep repeating to myself: "God! God! God!" A generation of rich and poor alike will be at the mercy of the hordes that will have new strength and means to fight and eat and pillage and rape their way through the country.

Villa's pleasure at the lifting of the embargo is readily understood. Late in December and early in January he had fought victorious battles in the beginning of his campaign toward the south. Later, however, from about the 10th of January on, his advance had been checked. Ammunition was short. Now, replenished by the abundant supplies that were rushed to him across the border, he returned from Juarez to his waiting army and resumed his advance. In March he attacked Torreon, which, after two weeks of hard fighting, he took on April 2, 1914. There, as usual, he shot many of the prisoners whom he had taken, sparing none of the officers of the Federalist Army, whom he executed on the charge that they were rebels against the true government, which he represented. From Torreon he drove out also about 700 Spaniards, not citizens of Mexico, many of whom afterwards reached El Paso destitute and starving. From Torreon Villa pushed on rapidly in pursuit of Gen. Velasco's army, which he overtook and defeated at San Pedro on April 9 and 10. In this battle it is said more than 3,000 of Huerta's soldiers were killed or wounded.

Villa, however, was not the only one of the Constitutionalist generals who was now fighting with arms and ammunition brought in since the embargo was lifted. Gen. Gonzales had attacked Tampico, and fighting was in progress there on April 9 when the incident occurred in that city which made it possible for President Wilson to increase once more the steady pressure of moral force by which he meant to hasten the collapse of Huerta's power.

On the 9th of April, 1914, Admiral Mayo sent the following telegram to Admiral Fletcher, who immediately forwarded it to Washington:

> This forenoon Mexican soldiers arrested paymaster and whaleboat's crew of Dolphin, part of whom were in boat with flag flying, marched them two blocks through streets and then back to boat, and there released them. Gen. Zaragoza expressed regret verbally. In view of publicity of event, I have called for formal disavowal and apology and punishment of officer in charge Mexican squad and salute to American flag within 24 hours from 6 p. m. Thursday.

A more complete statement of the incident is found in President Wilson's special address to Congress on April 20. The following is the paragraph which deals with this incident:

> On the 9th of April a paymaster of the U. S. S. Dolphin landed at the Iturbide Bridge landing at Tampico with a whaleboat and boat's crew to take off certain supplies needed by his ship, and while engaged in loading the boat was arrested by an officer and squad of men of the army of Gen. Huerta. Neither the paymaster nor anyone of the boat's crew was armed. Two of the men were in the boat when the arrest took place and were obliged to leave it and submit to be taken into custody, notwithstanding the fact that the boat carried, both at her bow and stern, the flag of the United States. The officer who made the arrest was proceeding up one of the streets of the town with his prisoners when met by an officer of higher authority, who ordered him to return to the landing and await orders; and within an hour and a half from the time of the arrest orders were received from the commander of the Huertista forces at Tampico for the release of the paymaster and his men. The release was followed by apologies from the commander and later by an expression of regret by Gen. Huerta himself.

From these official documents we learn that the men arrested by Col. Hinojosa were escorted two blocks through the city streets. They were met by an officer of higher rank and better judgment, who ordered that they be taken back at once to their boat. They were under arrest one hour and a half. They were released not on the demand of the American admiral, but on the appeal of a Mexican officer to the higher military authority in command of Gen. Huerta's forces at Tampico. Apology was made at once for their arrest and the officer responsible for it was himself placed under arrest to await his trial.

Admiral Mayo, believing that the publicity of the affair called for public ceremonies to make amends for it, demanded a salute. While the question of the salute was pending Gen. Huerta himself sent a written apology to the American chargé in Mexico, assuring the American Government that the Government of Mexico—

* * * deplores what has occurred in this case, which has grown out of nothing more than the misunderstanding of a subordinate official. His superior officer also proceeded to point out that the occurrence was unintentional, and that he had imposed upon Col. Hinojosa the disciplinary punishment within the authority of Gen. Zaragoza.

Gen. Huerta also said in the same apology:

If investigation should develop a greater responsibility on the part of Col. Hinojosa, the penalty applicable to the case will be imposed by the competent legal authorities.

President Wilson was not in Washington when this apology was received there, but was spending a short time at White Sulphur Springs. In his absence Secretary Bryan commented on the Tampico incident, saying that he believed Gen. Huerta's apology was sufficient, and that this Government could permit the matter to pass. Secretary Daniels expressed a similar opinion, saying:

I am inclined to believe that Admiral Mayo, who, after all, has this whole matter in his hands, will regard the apology of Huerta as sufficient. The greater includes the less, and if the Federal commander at Tampico should not actually salute the flag Admiral Mayo will pass by the matter, satisfied with what Huerta has said of the incident.

There was a general feeling of relief when the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Navy had thus expressed the belief that the crisis had passed; and not only responsible men in official life but the whole country breathed easier in the thought that whatever danger there might have been in the incident all was now happily ended.

When the President returned from White Sulphur Springs to Washington he disturbed this peaceful feeling and again aroused the apprehension of the country by declaring that the apology was not sufficient, the salute must be fired. On April 18 the President gave out the following statement:

Gen. Huerta is still insisting upon doing something less than has been demanded and something less than would constitute an acknowledgment that his representatives were entirely in the wrong in the indignities they have put upon the Government of the United States.

The President has determined that if Gen. Huerta has not yielded by 6 o'clock Sunday afternoon he will take the matter to Congress on Monday.

This statement was in Mexico City the same afternoon, and it could have no soothing effect upon the mind of the stubborn old Indian upon whose decision to salute or not to salute depended the whole issue of peace or war. It could hardly have been intended to have a soothing effect.

The President came to Congress on April 20 and asked for the support and approval of Congress in the course which it was his purpose to pursue. While Congress was still debating the resolution for which the President had asked, he ordered the beginning of hostilities. That resolution did not pass the Senate until April 22. In a letter of Secretary Daniels, addressed to the Secretary of State, and published in Senate Document No. 324, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, is the following:

In compliance with your request, I have the honor to inform you that on the night of April 20, 1914, in obedience to orders from the President of the United States, Admiral Fletcher, commanding the naval forces then stationed off Vera Cruz, Mexico, was directed to seize and hold the customhouse at Vera Cruz and not to permit war supplies to be delivered to the Huerta government or to any other party.

Marines were landed and the fight began. Nineteen Americans were killed and 70 wounded, and the Mexican loss was reported to be 126 killed and 195 wounded. What was the reason for this haste? What was the real reason for landing at Vera Cruz at all? Was it for the purpose of compelling Gen. Huerta to salute the flag in reparation for indignities put upon it at Tampico? Franklin K. Lane, then and now a member of President Wilson's Cabinet, says that that was not the reason. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee and an earnest defender of President Wilson's Mexican policy, placed Secretary Lane's statement in the temporary RECORD on July 21 (p. 13207). It is as follows:

Meanwhile the revolution had gained such headway in the north that it was difficult from day to day to say which had or occupied the greatest portion of Mexican territory. Huerta was keeping up his resistance because he was being supplied with ammunition from abroad. A ship was reported ready to land at Vera Cruz with a cargo of arms, and as a warning to Huerta and in proof of the seriousness of our purpose to bring Huerta to a recognition of our attitude, the order was given to seize the customhouse and occupy the port of Vera Cruz.

We did not go to Vera Cruz to force Huerta to salute the flag. We did go there to show Mexico that we were in earnest in our demand that Huerta must go, and he went before our forces were withdrawn. * * * We had gone to Vera Cruz "to serve mankind." Our only quarrel was with Huerta, and Huerta got out on July 16, 1914.

I ask you to compare this frank, outspoken declaration of Secretary Lane with the reasons given by the President when he asked Congress to support and approve his use of the armed forces of the United States in Mexico. The President said:

It was necessary that the apologies of Gen. Huerta should go much further; that they should be such as to attract the attention of the whole population to their significance and such as to impress upon Gen. Huerta himself the necessity of seeing to it that no further occasion for explanation and professed regrets should arise. I therefore felt it my duty to sustain Admiral Mayo in the whole of his demand and to insist that the flag of the United States be saluted in such a way as to indicate a new spirit and attitude on the part of the Huertistas.

Such a salute Gen. Huerta has refused, and I have come to ask your approval and support in the course which I now purpose to pursue. * * * I therefore come to ask your approval that I should use the armed forces of the United States in such ways and to such extent as may be necessary to obtain from Gen. Huerta and his adherents the fullest recognition of the rights and dignity of the United States, even amidst the distressing conditions now unhappily obtaining in Mexico.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. For a question.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, realizing that the gentleman is an authority on international law, having taught it in one of the American standard colleges, I desire to ask how he reconciles the refusal to recognize Huerta with the demand that he, Huerta, salute the flag, so far as its international aspect was concerned?

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I have since my childhood given up the unprofitable task of working out puzzles. I can not reconcile it.

Mr. FESS. Or, taking the other horn of the dilemma, Secretary Lane's position, from the standpoint of international law, what was the act, as interpreted by a neutral country, when we forbade a German vessel landing ammunition to Huerta?

Mr. TEMPLE. We had occupied the customhouse. The German vessel might land the ammunition, but if she did, she landed it in our hands. If there had been no blockade and we had nevertheless seized the vessel, it would have been an offense against Germany, but we landed and seized the Mexican customhouse, which, of course, was an act of war upon Mexico.

Mr. FESS. Another question with respect to international law. In case we put an embargo to prevent Huerta from getting it and lifted the embargo in order that Carranza could obtain ammunition, what would that be in international law as to Mexico? Was it a recognition of belligerency?

Mr. TEMPLE. I hardly know about that, but certainly it was hardly maintaining the position that we would not constitute ourselves an umpire between these parties.

There is not a word in the President's address to Congress of that which Secretary Lane says was the real purpose of the landing at Vera Cruz, namely, "to show Mexico that we were in earnest in our demand that Huerta must go." On the contrary, the President said in the same special message on Mexico, April 20, 1914:

I believe that I speak for the American people when I say that we do not desire to control in any degree the affairs of our sister Republic. * * * The people of Mexico are entitled to settle their own domestic affairs in their own way, and we sincerely desire to respect their rights.

We would respect it to the extent of telling them what man should not be their President—should not even be their candidate for President—and we gave expression to that earnest desire not to control their affairs by sending an army into their country to show them that we were in earnest in our demand that Huerta must go.

The vessel whose coming with a cargo of arms and ammunition for Huerta is said by Secretary Lane to have precipitated the seizure of the customhouse at Vera Cruz was the German merchant ship Ypiranga, of the Hamburg-American Line. She carried 15,000,000 rounds of ammunition and 200 machine guns. Secretary Daniels was quoted at the time as saying that the information as to the munitions of war on the Ypiranga was regarded as entirely trustworthy; not only was the Washington Government informed fully of what was on board before she sailed from Hamburg, but its information had been verified afterwards from bills of lading submitted to the examination of representatives of the United States Government. In the New York Times of April 22, printed and in the hands of its readers before the resolution approving of the use of armed force had passed the Congress, but after the landing had become an accomplished fact, Secretary Daniels was quoted as saying:

The instructions sent to Admiral Fletcher were that the arrival of the Ypiranga was to be his cue for landing at Vera Cruz.

Before passing from this incident it should be remarked that after waiting in Gulf waters for a few weeks, during which time an armistice had been arranged between Gen. Huerta and the United States Government, the Ypiranga proceeded to Puerto Mexico, and landed the arms and ammunition there. They were shipped by rail to Gen. Huerta at Mexico City. When the Ypiranga returned to Vera Cruz she was seized and a fine of 894,950 pesos was imposed upon her by the American officer in charge of the Mexican customhouse at Vera Cruz for landing the goods at another port than that to which they were consigned. A fine of 118,685 pesos was imposed on the steamship Bavaria for a similar offense. It is understood that these fines were never paid, but were remitted by the United States upon the urgent request of the German foreign office.

It will be remembered that on February 3, 11 weeks before the landing at Vera Cruz, President Wilson had lifted the embargo on arms and ammunition, having concluded that it was a departure from the practices of neutrality. On April 24, without the formality of a proclamation, he issued Executive orders forbidding the shipment of arms or ammunition into Mexico. Secretary Garrison transmitted these orders to the troops at the border with instructions for their strict enforcement.

On April 25 the ambassadors of Argentina, Brazil, and Chile tendered their good offices as mediators between Gen. Huerta and the United States. The offer was accepted on both sides and a suspension of hostilities was arranged on April 30.

On May 6 the Mexican minister of foreign relations complained to the mediators that arms and ammunition were being shipped from the United States to the constitutionalist armies in Mexico, although the American Government had promised that during the mediation such shipments should be forbidden. The mediators forwarded the protest to Secretary Bryan, who replied that the orders forbidding the shipment of arms and ammunition into Mexico were being enforced. Upon this assurance the mediators sent the following communication to the Mexican foreign office:

WASHINGTON, May 10, 1914.

To the MINISTER OF FOREIGN RELATIONS, Mexico:

Referring to your excellency's telegram of the 6th instant and amplifying ours of the 7th, we take pleasure in communicating to your excellency that the Government of the United States when mediation was offered was not permitting the passage of arms and ammunition across the border and that since that offer the passage of the same has not been permitted.

We reiterate to your excellency the assurances of our high consideration.

This letter was signed by the ambassadors of Argentina, Brazil, and Chile.

As if the United States were desirous of making this assurance doubly sure, a quantity of ammunition that had been shipped from New York for Gen. Huerta was transshipped at Habana on May 10 to a vessel bound back to New York, and there on May 13 this Huerta ammunition was taken by Government officials and removed to the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

On the same day, May 13, it was announced that the constitutionalists had captured Tampico. Secretary Daniels immediately declared that this port would be open to arms and ammunition shipped to the constitutionalists, adding, "In fact all the Mexican ports are open, even Vera Cruz, only," he continued, "shipments to Vera Cruz would not get very far inland."

Upon this announcement Carranza's agents for the purchase of munitions of war left the border towns, where the Army was enforcing the order which forbade the shipment of arms and ammunition across the international boundary, and went, some of them to Tampico and some to New York. The result of their efforts was seen on June 2, when the steamship Antilla, of the Ward Line, was granted clearance papers by the officers of the port of New York and sailed for Tampico with a cargo which included 3,000,000 rounds of ammunition and two military scout aeroplanes for the Carranza forces. Other ships, including the Susan and the Sunshine from Galveston, began to deliver American arms and ammunition to the same port.

Mr. Bryan was much concerned, and on June 3 called attention to the fact that the understanding between the United States and the mediating ambassadors was that while mediation was in progress no arms from the United States should be sent to Mexico, either by land or by water. Secretary Daniels, however, issued a formal statement saying that there had been "no change in the policy of the Government in reference to its desire that the port of Tampico shall be open to all commerce."

On June 7 Gen. Huerta ordered two gunboats of the little Mexican Navy to proceed to Tampico and blockade that port. Gen. Carranza had refused to enter into any armistice and was energetically carrying on the war. Gen. Huerta saw no reason why he should not blockade this port, which was in the hands of the Constitutionalists, and was a gateway through which they were receiving war supplies.

On the 8th of June the Huerta gunboats arrived at Tampico. Admiral Mayo communicated with them and told them that his orders were to prevent a blockade of that port. After conference with them Admiral Mayo reported to Washington that the Huerta commanders had yielded to superior force. On the same day Gen. Huerta announced that his armistice with the United States would not permit him to resist the action of the American Navy.

This brought about such a situation that the Cabinet as a whole took up the matter and decided on June 9 that there should be no more shipments of arms, and Secretary Redfield ordered the cargo of the El Sud to be held at Galveston. Three days later, on the 12th of June, the Antilla landed her cargo at Tampico. Then, and not until then, President Wilson issued an order clearing up what was said to be a misunderstanding between the several departments of this Government. That order is as follows:

As matters which relate to the clearance of vessels fall within the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce it is hereby ordered that instructions to customs officers concerning the exportation of arms and munitions of war to Mexico by sea shall be given that department. Similar instructions concerning exportations by land shall be issued by the Treasury Department.

The misunderstanding is an interesting one. Officials of the Treasury Department, with the aid of the Army under Secretary Garrison's instructions, were rigidly enforcing the order which prevented the shipment of arms across the international boundary. Secretary Daniels was persistently calling attention to Tampico as a port through which the Constitutionalists might obtain arms. Secretary Bryan was protesting that our honor was at stake and calling attention to his pledges to the three mediating ambassadors. Secretary Redfield was saying nothing but permitting officials in his department to issue clearance papers to the Antilla, the Sunshine, the Susan, and other vessels which were carrying arms to Tampico. The President did not issue the order clearing up the tangle until the day the Antilla landed her cargo at Tampico.

It is interesting to notice that just at this time the onward sweep of the Constitutionalist armies had been checked. Carranza's general, Panfillo Natero, was short of ammunition and had failed in his attack on Zacatecas on June 10 to 13. This city is about 300 miles inland from Tampico. The ammunition was landed there June 12. It is said to have been a portion of this shipment that Villa used on June 23 in a successful attack on Zacatecas, where he claimed to have killed 4,000, wounded 2,000, and captured 5,000.

Before we dismiss finally the question of the salute to the American flag, I wish to call attention to article 2, section B, of the final protocol signed June 24, 1914, as a result of the mediation at Niagara Falls between the United States and Gen. Huerta. It provided—

The Government of the United States of America will not in any form whatsoever claim a war indemnity or other international satisfaction.

The question has sometimes been asked what became of the salute. I answer that it is disposed of among the "other international satisfactions" which the American Government pledged itself not to claim.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. For a question.

Mr. DILLON. Can the gentleman tell us what became of the money collected at the customs house at Vera Cruz?

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, something over two and a half million pesos of money collected at Vera Cruz were sent to the treasury at New Orleans in a sealed safe and a sealed wooden box, and the last report is that the money is still there. It is there in the subtreasury if they have not later removed it. That interesting information is found in a communication from the Secretary of War to the Secretary of State in answer to a request for information about the Mexican money in our hands.

Mr. DILLON. Can the gentleman further tell us what is to be done with that money?

Mr. TEMPLE. That lies in the lap of the gods. I do not know.

Nevertheless, whatever became of the salute, the real purpose of the landing at Vera Cruz was accomplished. In accordance with another paragraph of that protocol, Gen. Huerta resigned his claim to the presidency of Mexico on July 15 and later departed from the country. Huerta was eliminated. So far as that is concerned, Mr. Wilson's policy succeeded. Referring to the matter a few months afterwards in a speech delivered in Indianapolis, President Wilson said:

With all due respect to editors of great newspapers, I have to say to them that I never take my opinions of the American people from their editorials. So that when some great dailies not very far from where I am temporarily residing thundered in rising scorn at watchful waiting, Woodrow sat back in his chair and chuckled, knowing that "he laughs best who laughs last."

This remark of the President's expressed a degree of satisfaction which the circumstances do not seem to have warranted. Huerta was gone, but the most appalling bloodshed since the overthrow of President Diaz was only well begun. The fighting between the forces of Carranza and those of Villa which followed the splitting of the Constitutionalist Party into two parts was not confined to northern Mexico. It spread throughout the Republic. It carried war and anarchy, bloodshed and starvation, more terrifying and more pitiful than before, into almost every part of the Republic, and the last stage of that country was worse than the first. It was precisely at this juncture that President Wilson said, in his Indianapolis address:

It is none of my business and it is none of your business how long they take in determining it. The country is theirs; the Government is theirs; the liberty, if they can get it—and God speed them in getting it—is theirs. And, so far as my influence goes, while I am President nobody shall interfere with them.

* * * * * * *

Have not European nations taken as long as they wanted and spilt as much blood as they pleased in settling their affairs? And shall we deny that to Mexico because she is weak? No, I say. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 9, 1915, p. 1279.)

At the time when President Wilson was thus asserting that nobody should deny to Mexicans the blessed privilege of spilling as much blood as they pleased, rifles and cartridges from the United States were going into Mexico. The embargo had been lifted in February, 1914, and the Executive orders issued after the landing at Vera Cruz to forbid such shipments had been revoked in September, 1914, "to avoid legal complications," the War Department said. These orders, it will be remembered, had been issued without the formality of a proclamation.

Many insisted that at least the embargo should be renewed. On June 2, 1914, the President issued a statement, addressed to the leaders of faction in Mexico, in which he described the situation as it then was. He said:

A central authority at Mexico City is no sooner set up than it is undermined and its authority denied by those who were expected to support it. Mexico is apparently no nearer a solution of her tragical troubles than she was when the revolution was first kindled. And she has been swept by civil war as if by fire. Her crops are destroyed, her fields lie unseeded, her work cattle are confiscated for the use of the armed factions, her people flee to the mountains to escape being drawn into unavailing bloodshed, and no man seems to see or lead the way to peace and settled order. There is no proper protection either for her own citizens or for the citizens of other nations resident and at work within her territory. Mexico is starving and without a government.

I, therefore, publicly and very solemnly call upon the leaders of faction in Mexico to act, to act together and to act promptly, for the relief and redemption of their prostrate country. I feel it to be my duty to tell them that if they can not accommodate their differences and unite for this great purpose within a very short time this Government will be constrained to decide what means should be employed by the United States in order to help Mexico save herself and save her people.

The unprecedented bloodshed and anarchy in Mexico was precisely what many advisers had foretold would be the result of President Wilson's policy if he should succeed in driving out the one man that would probably have been able to restore and maintain order there. Among others the diplomatic representatives in Mexico of the European powers, in July, 1914, after a consultation among themselves, had sent identical notes to their governments suggesting that these powers should say to the United States through their representatives in Washington that the position which the United States had taken with reference to Mexico was contributing to revolutionary conditions, and that this Government ought to recognize the government of Gen. Huerta or assume responsibility for the state of affairs there. The story of this incident was told at the time by the New York Times of July 15, 1913, and has since been confirmed by the publication of the note in which the American ambassador to Mexico communicated the information to the Government at Washington. The summary of the identical notes is in language that indicates a possibility that foreign nations may in due time attempt to hold the United States responsible for the loss of property and lives of foreigners in Mexico.

The question will be asked—it is always asked—What do you think the American Government ought to have done? Ought we to have recognized Gen. Huerta? Could we have recognized a murderer?

In answer I wish to say that I do not know whether Gen. Huerta was a murderer or not. The American ambassador to Mexico investigated that question and expresses his belief that Gen. Huerta was in no way privy to the killing of Madero. I do not know whether Huerta's claim to the presidency of Mexico was legitimate or not. I do know that recognition of Huerta's government would not have been an expression of opinion upon either of these matters.

The United States Government has had an established policy upon the question of recognition of new governments. In 1870 a short-lived revolutionary government was set up in Spain. Hamilton Fish, then Secretary of State, wrote to the American minister at Madrid under date of November 16, 1870, as follows:

We have always accepted the general acquiescence of the people in a political change of government as a conclusive evidence of the will of the Nation. When, however, there has not been such acquiescence, and armed resistance has been shown to changes made or attempted to be made under the form of law, the United States have applied to other nations the rule that the organization which has possession of the national archives and of the traditions of government, and which has been inducted to power under the forms of law, must be presumed to be the exponent of the desires of the people until a rival political organization shall have established the contrary.

In 1848 a new Government had been set up in France. James Buchanan, then Secretary of State, wrote on March 31, 1848, to the American minister in Paris:

In its intercourse with foreign nations the Government of the United States has, from its origin, always recognized de facto governments. We recognize the right of all nations to create and reform their political institutions according to their own will and pleasure. We do not go behind the existing government to involve ourselves in the question of legitimacy. It is sufficient for us to know that a government exists capable of maintaining itself; and then its recognition on our part inevitably follows.

In July, 1899, the President of Santo Domingo was assassinated. The Vice President who succeeded him relinquished the Government to the insurgents who were responsible for the assassination. Mr. John Hay, Secretary of State, wrote the American minister in October, 1899:

Upon your being satisfied that the new Government of Santo Domingo is in possession of the executive forces of the nation and administering the public affairs of the nation with due regard for the obligations of international law and treaties, you will enter into full relations with it.

It was not necessary to decide in haste. It would not have been out of harmony with our traditional policy to wait long enough to learn whether Huerta's government would be able to maintain itself. But we should have waited without announcing that the usurper must go—without breaking down Huerta's financial credit, without lifting the embargo to put arms into the hands of his enemies, without seizing the customhouse at Vera Cruz to prevent the landing of Huerta's supplies from the Ypiranga, without using the armed forces of the United States to insure the landing of Villa's ammunition from the Antilla.

The charge against the present administration is that against much good advice, against all tradition, contrary to all precedent, it chose to reverse the established policy of the United States and the result was disaster. [Applause on the Republican side.] It chose to sit in Washington as a benevolent despot controlling the fate of Mexico "to serve mankind," and the rash experiment failed. [Applause on the Republican side.] When all the so-called great powers and many of the smaller ones had recognized Gen. Huerta's government, it chose to rebuke them all by saying:

There can be no certain prospect of peace in America until Gen. Huerta has surrendered his usurped authority in Mexico; until it is understood on all hands, indeed, that such pretended governments will not be countenanced or dealt with by the Government of the United States. We are the friends of constitutional government in America; we are more than its friends, we are its champions.

This warning was not meant for Huerta alone. Who are those "on all hands" by whom it must be understood that we are the champions of constitutional government in America and that we will not deal with such governments as Huerta's? One can not but wonder whether this announcement had any connection with the advice given by the European diplomatists in Mexico to the Governments which they represented in the identical notes mentioned a few moments ago.

I have finished what I had to say. I do not wish to discuss here and now the present situation in Mexico, neither how we got in nor how we are to get out. These questions are now in negotiation and the situation is still unsettled. I will, however, express the earnest wish that, without further interference by the United States, order and settled government may soon prevail in unhappy Mexico. [Applause on the Republican side.]

JACOB HOFFMAN.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, House resolution 343, respecting one Jacob Hoffman, was passed by the House this afternoon, and I desire now to enter a motion to reconsider it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia enters a motion to reconsider the vote by which House resolution 343 was passed.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to take it up now, but I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a letter which I have received from the Secretary of State giving the information called for by this resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of State. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman also enters a motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion was passed, which motion will go over for further consideration until the next legislative day.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 15, 1916.

Hon. HENRY D. FLOOD,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FLOOD: In reply to a telephone message from the clerk of your committee concerning a privileged resolution in re one Jacob Hoffman (Jacob Jaeger), who has been detained by the British authorities at Vernon, British Columbia, I desire to say that the department's records show that action has been taken in this case as follows:

A letter was received from Representative Cox, May 23, 1916, transmitting a telegram from John P. Huther, Jasper, Ind., reporting that Jacob Hoffman, correct name Jacob Jaeger, was held at Vernon, British Columbia.

On May 25 the department telegraphically instructed the consul at Vancouver to investigate the matter and report fully by wire. On the same day Representative Cox was advised of this action.

On June 9 the department received a telegram from the consul general at Vancouver, stating that the British Columbia military authorities had referred Jaeger's case to Maj. Gen. Otter at Ottawa. Representative Cox was advised.

June 14 Representative Cox acknowledged this letter and stated that the department need not incur any further expenses by wiring, but he trusted that it would pursue the matter by correspondence until the facts were obtained.

On June 20 the department received another letter from Representative Cox, inclosing one from Mr. Bomar Taylor, of Jasper, Ind., in regard to the matter. He again stated that the expense of telegraphing need not be incurred, but that he hoped the nearest consul would be instructed to take the matter up and report at the earliest possible moment.

On June 26 the department, by dispatch, instructed the consul at Vancouver that Representative Cox had requested to be informed as soon as possible of the decision of the Canadian authorities in the case, and the consul was instructed to keep the department promptly informed of any developments. On the same day Representative Cox was advised of this action.

On June 30 the department received a telegram from the consul at Vancouver stating that the military authorities advised him that the major general at Ottawa did not consider the release of the prisoner desirable.

On July 7 Representative Cox was informed of the receipt of this telegram and that the department was sending written instructions to the consul general at Ottawa to report fully the grounds upon which Mr. Jaeger was detained.

On July 7 the consul general was so instructed by letter.

On July 12 the department received a letter from Representative Cox acknowledging the receipt of the department's telegram of June 29 and letter of July 7, insisting that the grounds upon which Jaeger was detained should be made known by the Canadian authorities.

On July 18 the department received another letter from Representative Cox to the same effect.

On July 18 the department advised the consul general at Vancouver of Representative Cox's request to be informed of the grounds upon which Hoffman is detained and instructed him to request of the Canadian authorities definitely the charges against Hoffman and upon what ground they decline to release him. Representative Cox was advised of this action.

On July 20 the department received a report by mail from the consul general at Ottawa, inclosing a letter from the director of internment in reply to one from the consul general inquiring the reasons for the detention of Hoffman and stating that he was captured by the police at Enderby, British Columbia, and the only reason given by them at the time of his arrest was that he was an alien enemy; but that he, the director, was writing for further particulars and would inform the consul general upon receipt of same.

On July 21 the department wired the consul general at Ottawa calling attention to its instruction and directing him to report fully by telegraph the grounds upon which Jaeger was detained.

On July 21 the department received another letter from Representative Cox urging vigorous action to ascertain the grounds upon which Jaeger was detained.

On July 22 the department received a telegram from the consul general at Ottawa stating that the internment officer had not receive a reply from Enderby concerning the detention of Jaeger and that a report was expected by the 26th or 27th of July.

Representative Cox was advised of the receipt of this letter dated July 25.

On July 29 the department received another letter from Representative Cox expressing the hope that the department would press the matter and stating that if he did not learn the reasons why Jaeger was interned he would introduce a bill to find out. On the same day the department received a telegram from the consul general at Ottawa stating that the internment officer had reported that reasons for arrest of Jacob Jaeger were the use of an assumed name and preparations for manufacturing explosives, and that no evidence was produced of American citizenship. This information was communicated to Representative Cox on August 10.

On August 8 the department received a dispatch, No. 1710, dated August 4, from the consul general at Ottawa, stating that he had made representations to the director of internment operations that Jacob Jaeger (or Jacob Hoffman), interned at Vernon, British Columbia, as a prisoner of war, was born at Ferdinand, Ind., February 26, 1866, and is therefore a native-born American citizen. With his dispatch the consul general transmitted copies of a letter of August 3 from the director of internment operations to the effect that if provision will be made for the admission of Hoffman into the United States and the necessary funds provided he will be released by the Canadian Government.

This information was communicated to Representative Cox by the department in a letter of August 11. A copy of the letter of August 3 from the director of internment operations accompanied the department's letter mentioned.

I am, my dear Mr. FLOOD,
Very truly, yours,

ROBERT LANSING.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order previously made, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] is recognized for one hour.

OUR ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL CONDITIONS AFTER THE EUROPEAN WAR.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the question which will determine the result of the presidential election is—

Under which party for the next four years will the United States of America best maintain its honor, its dignity, its sovereignty, and its economic independence among the nations of the world, and under the policies of which party will the average man here be best served, for this Government is supposed to be the servant and not the master of the people.

The European war did not begin in an assertion of the peoples' rights, but to perpetuate the divine right of kings to rule the people.

It was a crisis in a long-continued war for trade and the industrial domination of the world, and when the blood shall cease to flow and the slaughter shall have stopped from sheer exhaustion of a supply of victims to the greed of kings, the economic struggle will still go on with renewed intensity.

At its outbreak the President of the United States, in a splendidly phrased appeal for neutrality, called upon the American people to hold an equal poise of speech, of sympathy, and of act toward all of the contending nations, and then seems to have ignored it as a guide for his own administration.

PEACE NOT A POLITICAL ASSET.

When the history of these passing years shall have been written, it will then be known that the insane folly of a hundred million people participating in an adjustment of kingly powers 3,000 miles away was prevented by the grim determination of the calm, intelligent, conservative membership of both political parties in the two House of Congress, inspired by a sense of patriotic duty and not by any one man or set of men who, when the crisis is past, would make the outcome a political asset for themselves.

The sympathy of the American people should be for the stricken people of Europe and not for the warring kings, for who doubts that when the final adjustments are made, regardless of who may win, they will be transferred like cattle from one owner to another for a stipulated price, and the demolished thrones will be rebuilt and the decayed dynasties restored.

For us to share in such a holocaust of humanity, to such an end, would be the colossal crime of all the ages. [Applause.]

OUR SUPREME DUTY.

Our supreme duty is to prepare this Nation for complete defense against them all at any cost, and hold this continent as the one place in all the world where "government of the people by the people and for the people shall not perish from the earth."

Under awful provocation from all sides, in spite of things done to us by all of the contending nations which would have justified instant retaliation on our part, in the face of cruelties and barbarities on both sides of the conflict which neither God nor humanity can ever condone, the Christian sentiment of the American people has kept this Nation out of the war in Europe, and at the same time an inefficient and inconceivably vacillating diplomacy has twice plunged us into all the conditions of actual war on our Mexican border at home. This House has been authoritatively advised by the Democratic leader that the Mexican expenses will be met by a bond issue. Will it be called a bond issue by a Democratic administration to meet current expenses in time of peace or a bond issue to cover the expenses of a foreign war in Mexico?

Let us hope that the European conflict may soon be ended, and that the hundred thousand American boys now guarding our southern border from pillage and plunder by an unlimited assortment of bandits and thieves, may soon be returned to their homes.

But whatever the outcome of the European war may be, we know now by the declarations of all parties to it, that the intent and purpose of both sides is to enter at its close upon a renewed struggle for industrial and trade supremacy, and it is even now being pressed home to us as to what our relation to it shall be and how we as a nation will be effected by it, for while the conflict of arms may be localized, the trade war which will follow will be sure to be world-wide.

THE DRESDEN AND PARIS AGREEMENTS.

From the best information obtainable at this time it appears that on January 25, 1916, the representatives of the central powers—Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Bulgaria—met at Dresden to appoint a commission to work out an agreement, which, according to the official declaration of the allied powers at Paris on June 22, 1916, "has for its evident object the establishment of their domination over the production and the markets of the whole world and to impose upon the other countries an inacceptable hegemony."

To meet this declaration of a renewed world-wide trade war a conference of the allied powers was held at Paris on March 28, 1916, and a convention of the representatives of Great Britain, France, Belgium, Japan, Portugal, Servia, Italy, and Russia was authorized.

The convention was held at Paris July 14 to 17, 1916, and a copy of their agreement will be appended to my remarks. Let me briefly call attention to some of the salient points that we may clearly understand the situation which will confront the United States when the war is over.

THE OPPOSING FORCES.

First. The population of the central powers will be about 160,000,000, including Turkey, if there is any Turkey when the war is over. In the raw materials essential to a world domination, aside from iron, of which Germany is the second largest producer, these powers are distinctly lacking, but Germany has the second largest foreign shipping, and excepting Japan and Italy, a lower wage scale than any of her rivals. In efficiency, utilization of by-products, technical education of her people, intensive agriculture, coordination of industries at home, and scientific selling organization abroad, she leads the world.

Second. The allies, with their colonies, number about eleven hundred million people. They either monopolize or practically control the essential world's products which the central powers lack. Now, note them. They control coal, iron, manganese, tin, nickel, platina, the metallic alloys, aluminum, wool, jute, hemp, flax, silk, and rubber. Russia has the largest reserve supply of lumber in the world, and Egypt, India, and Russia are rapidly increasing their growth of cotton.

They mine a hundred and fifty times as much gold as the central powers, and practically three-quarters of the world's production, and boldly proclaim their complete control of the seas.

These are the opposing forces. Six-tenths of the world against one-tenth, and three-tenths neutral and with no voice in the matter, and if the press reports are correct, with the request of France that the United States might be admitted to the convention of the allies, refused by Great Britain.

INFRINGING OF RIGHTS OF NEUTRALS.

We have the comforting assurance, however, given by Premier Asquith, in the British Parliament on August 2, that "the resolutions of the conference are not aimed at neutrals," but the statement is hardly consistent with the provisions of paragraph 3 of the second section of the signed agreement, which reads:

The allies declare themselves agreed to conserve for the allied powers, before all others, their natural resources during the whole period of the commercial, industrial, agricultural, and maritime reconstruction, and for this purpose they undertake to establish special arrangements to facilitate the interchange of these resources.

That may not be aimed at neutral countries but it means the commercial ruin of the smaller ones, and a bitter industrial war with the others.

The agreement provides for joint action during the war period, for the reconstruction period, and for permanent measures of mutual assistance thereafter.

NO LIMIT TO THE LAST TWO PERIODS AS TO TIME.

I do not need to review the war period restrictions upon the world's commerce, for they are being put in practice every day. As an illustration, a Member of this House has now in New York City several thousand dollars worth of machinery sold to a customer of 20 years standing in the Argentine Republic. Those articles have no more relation to the European war than they have to the Kingdom of Heaven, and yet he can not ship them on a foreign ship without the permission of a foreign consul because the consignee is blacklisted and boycotted, or on an American ship because foreign coaling stations are closed to American ships for like reasons.

A few weeks ago a manufacturer in my home city was asked for specifications and bids upon machinery for a customer in Canada. He sent them in. Two days after the other bids were opened his was returned, having never reached its destination, but marked "Opened and returned by the censor," and the contract was awarded to a Canadian bidder.

BLACK LISTS AND BOYCOTTS.

On August 4 Australia issued a black list of American firms and announced that trading with them was prohibited.

On August 5 the Holland-American Line announced their refusal to receive any cargo for vessels of their line from firms or individuals on the black list published by the allies. The reason given was that "they were under agreement with the Dutch Government to take no shipment or do any act which jeopardizes the Government or themselves."

The boycott may not be aimed at neutrals, but it hits them just the same. On August 6 France issued its black list. In addition to the British boycott of Americans by the list of July 18, the press report says:

The complete list printed in the Journal Officiel covers 24 columns and includes firms and individuals in Africa, South America, Japan, the Philippine Islands, Cuba, Denmark, Spain, Portugal, Greece, Holland, Norway, and Sweden, with whom French citizens are forbidden to trade.

We are told that our mails have been robbed, our legitimate trade with neutral nations apportioned to suit the ideas of belligerents; American cargoes have been captured and resold at large profits to countries of original destination; our ships have been blacklisted, and our merchants and manufacturers have been refused the poor privilege of paying enormous prices for raw materials, except upon pledges given that the finished products into which they go shall not be sold anywhere in foreign trade without the previous approval of the allied powers.

Orders in council have been substituted for international law, the contraband lists have been enlarged at will, and international agreements absolutely ignored.

DOMINATION OF WORLD TRADE.

Now, I yield to no man in condemnation of the barbarisms and brutal atrocities which characterize this awful war, whether it is in the sinking of unarmed merchantmen without warning, the agony of Belgium, the desolation of Poland, the use of poison gases, the bombs dropped from the sky on defenseless cities, the shooting of nurses, or the hanging of revolutionists; but these will stop with the termination of hostilities, while by the Paris agreement the avowed purpose of the allies is not only—I am quoting from the agreement—"to conserve for themselves before all others their own natural resources" after the war is over but "to develop their own economic activities to the end of assuring their independence both in regard to sources of supply and in their financial, commercial, and maritime organization." I concede that they would have a perfect right to do this if it could be done in a legitimate way without transgressing upon the rights of neutrals; but when they declare that they will—I am again quoting—"devise measures which will prevent the central powers from exercising in time of peace within their own territories the industries and professions which concern their own national defense or economic independence," they thereby declare their own intention to dominate the trade of the world for their own purposes and to compel every neutral power to surrender their own right to commercial relations with other powers on terms and conditions which any two nations may agree upon for themselves; and, whatever the smaller nations of Europe may do, I am very sure that the Western Hemisphere, under the leadership of the United States of America, will never accept the suzerainty of Europe, for the Monroe doctrine is not only a protest against the extension of the existing monarchical systems here but a notice to all the world that encroachments upon the commercial and political rights of popular governments on the Western Hemisphere will not be tolerated. [Applause.]

The time is rapidly coming in this world's affairs when the rights of belligerents must be subordinated to the rights of neutrals, and whatever Norway and Sweden and Denmark and Holland may now be compelled to submit to by reason of their geographical position and the overwhelming power of the warring nations, there is not the slightest excuse for us, 3,000 miles away, for not asserting and maintaining our rights under the law of nations against all violations of them from either side of the present conflict. [Applause.]

SAFEGUARD OUR OWN ECONOMIC INDEPENDENCE.

We have had too much of angleworm diplomacy in the past, neither backbone nor straightness, and unless we protest emphatically now against the policies outlined for the future by the Paris convention, and prepare ourselves against their enforcement, we may be ground between the upper and nether millstones of imperial combinations, and ultimately find it too late "to safeguard our own economic independence," a thing which Charles E. Hughes has just declared to be our urgent duty as a Nation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Oh, for another Ulysses S. Grant or Grover Cleveland in the Executive chair [applause], and a Richard Olney or James G. Blaine or John Hay to control our diplomatic relations when the war is over.

DEMOCRACY INEFFICIENT.

Are the policies of the party now in power adapted to the changing conditions which await us? I say, emphatically, no. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The ink is hardly dry on their platform declaration of renewed faith in a tariff for revenue only when they admit the complete failure of the Underwood law to meet their own extravagant expenditures by turning to direct taxation upon the industries of the Nation.

They utterly ignore the fact that the moment the war orders cease, their revenue from these sources will stop, and with the lowest tariff in the world in operation here, our markets will be wide open to the exports of our rivals while theirs will be closed to us.

AFTER-WAR PERIOD.

The first paragraph of the third section of the Paris declaration, providing for "permanent measures of mutual assistance and collaboration" after the war has stopped and the period of reconstruction has been passed, proclaims that the allied powers—

THIS IS WHAT THEY ARE GOING TO DO.

May have recourse to either enterprises subsidized and directed or controlled by the Governments themselves, or to the grant of financial assistance for the encouragement of scientific and technical research, and the development of national industries and resources, or to customs duties or prohibitions of a temporary or permanent character, or to a combination of these different methods.

The agreement adds, "Whatever may be the method adopted, the object aimed at by the allies is to increase the production within their territories, as a whole, to a sufficient extent to enable them to maintain and develop their economic position and independence in relation to enemy countries."

Do our Democratic friends imagine that this means that they intend to sell to us at competitive prices the raw materials which they control and which they say they will "conserve for themselves above all others," and that this country will sell back to them the finished products made from them, or that they intend to do the manufacturing and sell the finished product to us at prices dictated and maintained by the greatest international trust and combination which the world has ever seen?

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly, if I have any time.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does the gentleman conceive that the carrying out of this policy on the part of the allies will involve the abrogation of all commercial treaties?

Mr. HILL. Absolutely. The agreement says so, as I understand it.

And yet the Democratic Party proposes to handicap, by direct taxation, the very industries which must receive the heaviest blows in this great struggle.

"But," said a Democrat to me a few days ago, "they can not do this successfully."

Why not?

OUR FOREIGN TRADE.

For two years we have had a Federal Trade Commission struggling with the problem of how to exploit foreign trade by combinations of corporations and individuals here and yet not violate the law at home.

If we can do this thing for individual profit, why should not the allies do it on a national scale for national defense? It can hardly be expected, however, that American producers will go heavily into foreign trade under a governmental policy here which disclaims responsibility for the lives and property of its citizens outside of our own territorial limits. If such a policy is to be continued, the Federal Trade Commission might as well resign or take up some other line of work.

The reports from our consuls abroad show absolutely that the allied powers, while still engaged in a struggle for life, are rapidly increasing their industrial output. In the month of June, with our ports wide open, nearly a quarter of a billion of foreign products came into the American market place, at an average rate of duty of 8.1 per cent; and for the first six months of 1916 the imports exceed the same six months of the previous year by $433,000,000. What will it be when the 4,000 factories in England now commandeered for war supplies are restored to the arts of peace and the hives of industry in Belgium and northern France are again reopened and the accumulated products of German factories, where not a smokestack has been destroyed are all let loose upon the neutral nations to meet the demands of the staggering debts which the war has caused?

Democracy points with pride to the enormous exports of the past year, and the official statistical prevaricators to the administration have tried to show that only a small percentage of them is due to the war's demand.

They may think they are deluding the American people but they are not, they are only amusing them by their audacity, for there is not a workingman or woman in the United States who can read the newspapers who does not know that trade conditions were absolutely reversed on August 1, 1914, when the European war began, and that the scarlet fever of prosperity will instantly stop when the cannon cease to roar over the blood-stained fields of Europe. [Applause on Republican side.]

A few days ago I said to a silk manufacturer: "You ought to be glad that your industry is not disarranged by the war's requirements." He replied: "It is; the demand for silk bags to hold the charges of powder for the heavy guns has enormously increased the price of our raw materials. It is the only fiber which leaves no spark in the guns and prevents a premature explosion when loading again."

Since that incident I have concluded that our normal export and import trade has been practically revolutionized by the war. That the situation may be more clearly understood I will append to these remarks a list of contraband of war and of articles the entry of which into Great Britain is now prohibited.

Read it. I make the statement here and now that not a bale of cotton or a box of matches can go out of an American port without the consent of Great Britain to-day, either expressed or assumed.

FINANCIAL PREPAREDNESS.

Are we financially prepared for the coming contest? Since August 1, 1914, to August 1, 1916, our exportations aggregated about $7,400,000,000. Assuming that the average profit on all importations is 10 per cent, we have added to our working capital $740,000,000 from this source.

During the same time, we have made and are making foreign loans aggregating more than $1,500,000,000. It aggregated more than that this morning. The paper announces another one from Chile. Probably it will go to two thousand millions of dollars, every dollar of which has been taken from liquid capital and turned into fixed investments.

At the beginning of the war Europe held American securities estimated at from six to eight billion of dollars. Of these it is admitted that we have bought back about $2,000,000,000 worth, and every dollar of this has been taken from liquid capital and turned into fixed investments. At the lowest estimate, $4,000,000,000 of indebtedness to Europe still remains which, everyone admits, is being fed back to us as fast as it can be absorbed without smashing the market price here.

If the war continues another year, and further foreign loans are made, and more of our own securities bought back, as they will be, every dollar above the profit on exports, so invested, will be taken from working capital and turned into fixed investments. These investments, it is true, will give an average return of about 5 per cent.

BOND ISSUES.

But now we face another problem. It is estimated that the mobilization of the National Guard and the cost of the Mexican War will be $125,000,000, to be met by a bond issue, and every dollar of this will be taken from liquid working capital and used "to pay for a dead horse."

Furthermore, the enormous and unnecessary increase in Government expenses, the appropriations to satisfy sectional demands, the cost of many projects which, perhaps, worthy in themselves, might well be deferred, and added to all these the great expenditure essential to adequate national defense, will require additional taxation for the fiscal year of 1917 of at least $500,000,000, and raised, as it will be, by direct taxation on incomes and industries, every dollar of it will be taken out of the liquid working capital of the Nation, with no possible pecuniary return.

How the rural-credit law will affect the liquid capital of the Nation no man can even imagine, but according to the report of the committee the funds necessary to make it a success are to be secured by the sale of billions of bonds free of all national, State, and municipal taxes, and much of the amount they will represent will be changed from the liquid working capital of the Nation to a long-term fixed investment.

FOREIGN DEPOSITS.

Again, no man knows how much of the enormous deposits of our banks and trust companies is of foreign ownership, placed here for safety and concealed under American names, while all Europe is engulfed in the horrors of war.

The enthusiastic and irrepressible Secretary of the Treasury boasts of an increase of over $2,000,000,000 in a single year, and then adds:

These figures are so prodigious as to be almost unbelievable. Even the infallible and sanctified Republican Party could not have done better.

My friend smiles. During the Civil War there was a certain general who was "long" on earthwork construction and "short" on fighting ability. The boys made this conundrum about him: "Why is Gen. Blank like a mole?" The answer was, "Because, blind to everything about him, he still keeps on digging."

I commend to the Secretary a little prudence and caution in the disposition of these funds by the Federal Reserve Board, of which he is the master mind, for though he attributes all the credit for them to the Democratic Party he will wake up if the war should stop suddenly and the period of reconstruction of Europe begins and find that the gold which represents them here will be called for by Europe and that it will disappear here like dew before the rising sun.

In view of all these things is it not inevitable that the time is rapidly coming when the shortage of working capital will not only compel higher interest rates and increased cost of production, but force a contraction of our industries at the very time when industrial preparedness is most needed?

STOP AND THINK.

Is it not high time to stop and think? It is easy for our Democratic friends, backed up by a party caucus vote, to pass laws providing for any kind of future expenditures, but I venture the assertion now that if the taxes to meet them were to be collected before November 1, 1916, instead of after January 1, 1917, even the solid South would go Republican in the next election. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The duty that lies before us now is financial and industrial preparation for an economic war, and to provide military and naval equipment for national defense, and my honest judgment is that we are getting neither under the policies of the party in power.

For example, I am authoritatively advised by a member of the Naval Committee that this administration will not and can not put into commission one ship, large or small, authorized during the life of the administration, and that battleships 43 and 44, authorized March 3, 1915, are not even begun.

THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM.

In a recent speech entitled "Prosperity and the Future," delivered by Secretary McAdoo, and which has already been printed three times at Government expense, and is therefore a fair subject for review. He says:

> The Federal reserve act, which is now generally conceded to be the most constructive measure placed upon our statute books in a half century, is the greatest contributing factor in this happy condition. * * * Not only has the reserve system provided ample credit resources and strengthened the financial structure of the country immeasurably, but is has caused a more equitable diffusion of credits, has reduced rates of interest and has mitigated already and in great measure the abuses of usury in those parts of the country where usury has been a serious handicap to business and enterprise.

BANK MEMBERSHIP.

I reply, first, 7,617 national banks and 19,457 State banks and trust companies do not concede the excellence of the system, for the national banks were forced in under the penalty of liquidation within a year if they did not go voluntarily, and of the 19,457 other banks, according to the last report of the comptroller, only 24 of them had joined. I understand that at the end of the second year there have been 10 more.

A lawyer once said in court that he had 16 reasons why an important witness was absent; the first of which was he was dead. The judge at once said that he need not give the other 15. In this case the statistics are a complete reply.

Much more favorable terms of membership were given to State banks than to national banks by the law itself, and even these conditions have been greatly liberalized by the Federal Board, and yet they refuse to join the system. Mr. Arthur Welton, of the American Bankers' Association, a very able man, in a published article the past week, has summarized the situation as follows. He says:

> Properly considered, the reserve system has advanced the country only from the position of having the worst currency and banking scheme to that of having one a little better. It has done just enough to demonstrate the necessity of doing more.

Second. Not $1 of banking capital has gone into the Federal reserve banks which did not come from the resources of the member banks, and their loaning power has been reduced by stock payments in the precise degree by which the loaning power of the Federal reserve banks has been established by them.

Third. The only increase of credit resources caused by the Federal reserve act is due to the reduction of required reserve. Whether it is prudent and safe to ignore the experience of the past half century has not yet been tested and settled. The board admits that it would be dangerous for State banks to do it. So far as the banks in the manufacturing sections are concerned, and I speak from experience, the weekly pay rolls have always compelled and always will compel the maintenance of reserves in excess of the old law, so that the reduction is of no benefit to them. I think that is substantially true of all so-called country banks.

Instead of increasing credit resources, as the Secretary claims, the effect of the law will probably be to reduce them, except in the reserve cities, for thus far the country banks have in most cases maintained as large balances as before with their old reserve agents, and the required reserve with the Federal reserve banks has been idle money, giving no return whatever, and the same thing is true of the 5 per cent redemption fund, which under the new law is not counted as a part of the reserve.

Fourth. The new law does not give a "more equitable diffusion of credits," as claimed by the Secretary, but the effect has been distinctly the reverse of that.

CONCENTRATION OF CREDITS.

Under the old system the reserves of the national banks were held by 367 reserve banks in 47 reserve cities and 3 central reserve cities and were placed there by the voluntary action of all the banks, and while there were controlled by between three and four thousand directors chosen without regard to their political views and for their business ability by the stockholders who had put their own money into the banking business.

Under the Federal Reserve System the reserves are concentrated in 12 banks in 12 cities and are placed there by compulsion of law and put under the absolute control of seven men here in Washington, every one of them of one political faith and always to be named by the leader of a political party, with no possibility of the owners of the property ever having a voice in the matter.

NO PLACE FOR POLITICS.

I am not saying this in criticism of the men who are now in control. I would condemn it just as strongly if they were all of my political views. The inevitable result of this under our system of government is to ultimately make a political football of the business interests of the country and to make the system a political machine. When the bill was under consideration by Congress I represented Connecticut in a specially called bankers' convention at Chicago, and was there named as one of a committee of 12 to review it and suggest amendments for its improvement.

I moved to strike out every political allusion from it, including the party division of the Federal board. One gentleman said, "Why, Mr. HILL, would you allow a President to appoint them all from one party?" I replied, "No President ever lived, none is living now, and none will ever live, who will make a great business institution such as this must be a political machine." I was mistaken. [Applause on the Republican side.] And these men, representing three different political views, unanimously voted to recommend the striking out of every such reference, and the convention, composed wholly of bankers, sent a committee of seven, headed by Mr. J. B. Forgan, of Chicago, to Washington to submit their amendments to the Senate committee. The change was made, and it has always been a matter of profound regret to me that I made the motion, for in the organization of the districts and in some rulings of the board since it has been impossible to satisfy the public and the member banks that political rather than business considerations have not sometimes prevailed.

It may be that this concentration of capital under the absolute control of seven men may possibly result in "a more equitable diffusion of credit," as the Secretary says, but who knows? Concerning it the Hon. CARTER GLASS once said that "the board could determine the welfare, happiness, and prosperity of every man, woman, and child in the United States," and Mr. UNDERWOOD declared that "it resolved itself into faith in the President's board, the whole question being whether the board was angel or devil."

Such a despotic control as this of the financial welfare of this great Nation ought to be as thoroughly divorced from politics as the Supreme Court of the United States has heretofore been supposed to be.

USURY.

Fifth. The Secretary claims that the system has mitigated the abuses of usury in certain sections of the country. There is nothing to the claim, for it is a man and not a system which has done that. The man who is entitled to credit is the Hon. John Skelton Williams, acting in the capacity of the Comptroller of the Currency, and he is entitled to the thanks of the country for it. He began the work of exposing the abuses three weeks before a Federal reserve bank was organized, taking it up first with the city banks and then following it up in the country districts.

It took nerve and courage to do it, but the effect of the publicity given to the abuses has reached straight down into the State bank system, over which the Federal Reserve Board has had no control whatever.

A review of the whole reform will be found in the last report of the comptroller.

RECOGNITION OF RESPONSIBILITY.

There is enough of good in the Federal Reserve System to justify its existence as a step toward better things.

For what good there is the country may first of all thank the Hon. CARTER GLASS, of Virginia [applause], who from the very beginning, to my personal knowledge, stood like a rock against the adoption of the financial heresies of some of his party associates of high and low degree, and it is only fair to him to say that as conditions were before Mr. Bryan was lifted out of the Cabinet, the sturdy good sense and sound-money principles of CARTER GLASS, backed up by the cooperation of the American Bankers' Association and the criticisms of the Republican Party, saved the administration from itself.

I earnestly urge upon him now a most cautious consideration of the pending recommendations of the board for the amendment of the law, for I believe that the gold-standard act, adopted by a Republican Congress, has never received a harder blow than now, when the Federal Reserve Board recommends to Congress that member banks be allowed "to count as part of their lawful reserves Federal reserve notes of their own district not exceeding in the aggregate an amount equal to 5 per cent of their net demand deposits."

That means the authorization, on the basis of the bank reports of May 1, 1916, of the substitution of three hundred and twenty-seven millions of nonlegal tender Government notes for a like amount of legal tender in the vaults of the member banks.

WHAT PREVENTED A PANIC IN 1914.

The speech of the Secretary is in itself a complete refutation of the claim made by the Secretary of the Navy not long ago, when he said:

In the coming Democratic campaign the greatest asset is the currency measure, for if it had not been for the currency bill put through by the Democrats there would have been a panic in the United States when the European war came on.

On July 10 the President also said at Detroit that "it saved us from a ruinous panic when the stress of war came on."

If it were necessary to bring any other proof that this could not have been so than the simple fact that the Federal reserve banks were not even organized until three and one-half months after the war began, such proof is found in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1914, in which he says:

The outbreak of the European war precipitated many great problems. It is a tribute to the economic strength and soundness of the country and to the patriotism of its people in every class and walk of life that the shock has been so admirably withstood. This has been accomplished notwithstanding the fact that the Federal Reserve System authorized by the act of December 23, 1913, was at that time only in process of formation, and was therefore unable to render any service in the situation.

Furthermore, after two years of calm reflection the Secretary now says the salvation of the country from panic was an achievement of the administration, and perhaps too modestly adds:

It was the leadership and action of the Government at Washington in cooperation with the leading bankers and business men of the country.

He never once mentions the Federal Reserve System with reference to it.

My own judgment is that the Federal reserve law had nothing to do with it, and the Aldrich-Vreeland law had very little, but that the closing of the stock exchanges of this country on July 30 and the declaration of the moratoria all over Europe prevented the closing out of collaterals there and here and stopped the dumping of our own securities from Europe and prevented a panic from starting.

Under these circumstances I would suggest that when Senator OLLIE JAMES, with his matchless oratorical ability, renews to the voters of Maine in the coming campaign the question which he put to the St. Louis convention, and which has never been answered, to wit, "What would have been the result if the old Republican system had been in effect when the world's war broke on us?" that the voters on the back seats in Maine simply answer, "It was in effect."

A GOOD FOUNDATION TO BUILD ON.

The Federal reserve act is a good foundation on which to build a banking system, but some method should be devised to draw into its membership the 19,457 State banks and trust companies which are sharing the benefits and leaving the national banks to pay the expenses of maintenance. As organized the system is top-heavy with expenses which, apparently, can never be met unless the Federal banks enter into direct competition for business with the member banks whose money they are using.

I am very confident that one central-reserve bank governed and controlled by a board of 19 directors, including the members of the present Federal board and the present board of 12 governors, with branches wherever business justified them, could be operated far more economically and effectively than the present cumbersome and expensive system ever can be.

A few months ago I said to an officer of one of the large banks in another part of the country, pointing to a Federal reserve bank near by: "Will you kindly tell me what advantage that institution is to you?" His answer was, "None whatever, except the privilege of paying part of the expense of maintaining it."

NATIONAL BANKING SYSTEM.

Through more than half a century of magnificent success the national banking system has been denounced by the Democracy in their party platforms, on the stump, and in both Houses of Congress. It had its faults, but in its inception it helped mightily to save the Nation's life, and ever since it has provided a national currency by which no man has ever lost a dollar. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The stockholders furnished the money and the brains to make it a success.

DEMOCRACY'S GREATEST ASSET.

At the close of business on July 21, 1916, the new system had drawn $547,000,000, which cost them nothing, from the funds of the old associations, and yet up to the present time it has not been able to earn its own living or, except in two cases which were specially favored by the Treasury, pay any returns to the actual owners of the institution. And this through a year and eight months of war prosperity, which Secretary McAdoo facetiously says "even the infallible and sanctified Republican Party could not have bettered."

If, as Secretary Daniels says, Democrats are going into the next campaign with this achievement as their "greatest asset," "sanctified Republicans" are perfectly content, for as victorious and triumphant Republicans in the Sixty-fifth Congress they will amend it to meet successfully the test which it has never yet had. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I have stated to you the economic conditions which we must face at the end of the war and the absolute unpreparedness of the Democratic Party to meet them if it is continued in power.

It is useless to reply, as the President said to Congress on December 8, 1914, with reference to military and naval preparedness, "There is no need now to discuss it. We shall not alter our attitude now, because some amongst us are nervous and excited."

A year later that same party leader said to the citizens of Chicago, speaking of "national necessity," as he termed it then, "It has awakened me, myself. I frankly confess to you to many things and many conditions which a year ago I did not realize. I did not realize then that the things were possible which have since become actual facts."

I say to Woodrow Wilson and the Democratic Party now that full notice has been served on all the world by eight sovereign nations banded together under signed and sealed agreements on one side and by three nations on the other that when peace does come they propose to fan again into life the flame which set all Europe on fire two years ago, and contend again for the industrial domination of the world.

DYESTUFFS AND CHEMICALS.

A year ago, Democrats, you had the chance to relieve this Nation from a foreign monopoly in dyestuffs and chemicals essential to our industries, and in high explosives, the prime necessity of modern warfare. While you have delayed, at an enormous cost to our own people, a rival power has made the products and built a ship and sent it beneath the seas into our ports, and is now returning for another cargo. Now you defer till the war is over even your feeble attempt at relief from a cruel monopoly, for which this Nation has so patiently waited, and meanwhile disarm yourselves in face of the enemy.

Oh, the supreme folly of such a course.

AN APPEAL FROM WOODROW WILSON TO CHARLES E. HUGHES.

The American people demand, and have a right to demand, that in all the field of human endeavor, in everything possible to our soil, our climate, and our productive skill they shall have at least an equal chance with foreign producers in our own market place. [Applause on the Republican side.]

They demand, and they have a right to demand, that such policies shall be pursued as to make our fields laugh at their own abundance, our factories hum with the industry of contented labor, and our homes be filled with happiness and the comforts of life. They ask you for bread and you give them a stone.

They demand, as they have a right to demand, an Army consistent with the greatness of a Nation of a hundred million freemen determined to maintain their freedom as a sacred thing, and for a Navy which will give a safe and sure defense on both oceans, so that we need fear none but God.

To this end, and in utter despair of its accomplishment at your hands, I appeal from Woodrow Wilson and Democratic extravagancies in minor things and shortcomings in larger ones to Charles E. Hughes and the sure achievements of a reunited Republican Party, and patiently wait for the people's verdict at the next election. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

APPENDIX A.

ECONOMIC CONFERENCE OF THE ALLIED GOVERNMENTS.

The representatives of the allied Governments have met in Paris, Mr. Clémentel, Minister of Commerce, presiding, on the 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th of June, 1916, for the purpose of fulfilling the mandate which was confided to them by the conference of Paris on March 28, 1916, to put into practice their solidarity of views and interests and to propose to their respective Governments suitable measures for realizing this solidarity.

They perceive that the central powers of Europe, after having imposed upon them their military struggle in spite of all their efforts to avoid the conflict, are preparing to-day, in concert with their allies, a struggle in the economic domain which will not only survive the re-establishment of peace but, at that very moment, will assume all its amplitude and all its intensity.

They can not, in consequence, conceal from themselves that the agreement which is being prepared for this purpose amongst their enemies has for its evident object the establishment of their domination over the production and the markets of the whole world and to impose upon the other countries an inacceptable hegemony.

In the face of such a grave danger the representatives of the allied Governments consider that it is their duty, on the grounds of necessary and legitimate defense, to take and realize from now onward all the measures requisite on the one hand to secure for themselves and the whole of the markets of neutral countries full economic independence and respect for sound commercial practice, and on the other to facilitate the organization on a permanent basis of this economic alliance. For this purpose the representatives of the allied Governments have decided to submit for the approval of their Governments the following resolutions:

A. MEASURES FOR WAR PERIOD.

I. Laws and regulations prohibiting trading with the enemy shall be brought into accord, for this purpose:

(a) The allies will prohibit their own subjects and citizens and all persons residing in their territories from carrying on any trade with the inhabitants of enemy countries of whatever nationality, or with enemy subjects, wherever resident, persons, firms, and companies whose business is controlled wholly or partially by enemy subjects or subject to enemy influence, whose names will be included in a special list.

(b) The allies will also prohibit importation into their territories of all goods originating or coming from enemy countries.

(c) The allies will further devise means of establishing a system of enabling contracts entered into with enemy subjects and injurious to national interests to be canceled unconditionally.

II. Business undertakings, owned or operated by enemy subjects in the territories of the allies, are all to be sequestrated or placed under control. Measures will be taken for the purpose of winding up some of these undertakings and realizing the assets, the proceeds of such realizations remaining sequestrated or under control. In addition, by export prohibitions, which are necessitated by the internal situation of each of the allied countries, the allies will complete the measures already taken for the restriction of enemy supplies both in the mother countries and the dominions, colonies, and protectorates—

1. By unifying lists of contraband and export prohibition, particularly by prohibiting the export of all commodities declared absolute or conditional contraband;

2. By making the grant of licenses to export to neutral countries, from which export to the enemy territories might take place, conditional upon the existence in such countries of control organizations approved by the allies, or, in the absence of such organizations, upon special guarantees, such as the limitation of the quantities to be exported and supervision by allied consular officers, etc.

B. TRANSITORY MEASURES FOR THE PERIOD OF THE COMMERCIAL, INDUSTRIAL, AGRICULTURAL, AND MARITIME RECONSTRUCTION OF THE ALLIED COUNTRIES.

I. The allies declare their common determination to insure the re-establishment of the countries suffering from acts of destruction, spoliation, and unjust requisition, and they decide to join in devising means to secure the restoration to those countries, as a prior claim, of their raw materials, industrial, agricultural plant and stock, and mercantile fleet, or to assist them to reequip themselves in these respects.

II. Whereas the war has put an end to all treaties of commerce between the allies and enemy powers, and it is of essential importance that during the period of economic reconstruction the liberty of none of the allies should be hampered by any claim put forward by enemy powers to most-favored-nation treatment, the allies agree that the benefit of this treatment will not be granted to those powers during a number of years, to be fixed by mutual agreement among themselves.

During this number of years the allies undertake to assure each other, so far as possible, compensatory outlets for trade in case consequences detrimental to their commerce should result from the application of the undertaking referred to in the preceding clause.

III. The allies declare themselves agreed to conserve for the allied countries, before all others, their natural resources, during the whole period of the commercial, industrial, agricultural, and maritime reconstruction, and for this purpose they undertake to establish special arrangements to facilitate the interchange of these resources.

IV. In order to defend their commerce and industry and their agriculture and navigation against economic aggression, resulting from dumping or any other mode of unfair competition, the allies decide to fix by agreement a period of time during which commerce with the enemy powers will be submitted to special treatment, and goods originating from their countries will be subjected either to prohibitions or to a special régime of an effective character. The allies will determine by agreement, through diplomatic channels, the special conditions to be imposed during the above-mentioned period on the ships of enemy powers.

V. The allies will devise measures to be taken jointly or severally for preventing enemy subjects from exercising in their territories certain industries or professions which concern national defense or economic independence.

C. PERMANENT MEASURES OF MUTUAL ASSISTANCE AND COLLABORATION AMONG THE ALLIES.

I. The allies decide to take the necessary steps without delay to render themselves independent of enemy countries in so far as regards raw materials and manufactured articles essential to the normal development of their economic activities. These measures will be directed to assuring the independence of the allies, not only so far as concerns sources of supply, but also as regards their financial, commercial, and maritime organization. The allies will adopt such measures as seem to them most suitable for the carrying out of this resolution according to the nature of the commodities and having regard to the principles which govern their economic policy. They may, for example, have recourse to either enterprises subsidized and directed or controlled by the Governments themselves or to the grant of financial assistance for the encouragement of scientific and technical research and the development of national industries and resources, or to customs duties or prohibitions of a temporary or permanent character, or to a combination of these different methods.

Whatever may be the methods adopted, the object aimed at by the allies is to increase the production within their territories as a whole to a sufficient extent to enable them to maintain and develop their economic position and independence in relation to enemy countries.

II. In order to permit the interchange of their products, the allies undertake to adopt measures facilitating mutual trade relations, both by the establishment of direct and rapid land and sea transport service at low rates and by the extension and improvement of postal, telegraphic, and other communications.

III. The allies undertake to convene a meeting of technical delegates to draw up measures for the assimilation, so far as may be possible, of their laws governing patents, indications of origin, and trade-marks. In regard to patents, trade-marks, literary and artistic copyright which come into existence during the war in enemy countries, the allies will adopt, so far as possible, an identical procedure to be applied as soon as hostilities cease. This procedure will be elaborated by the technical delegates of the allies.

D. Whereas for the purpose of their common defense against the enemy the allied powers have agreed to adopt a common economic policy on the lines laid down in the resolutions which have been passed; and whereas it is recognized that the effectiveness of this policy depends absolutely upon these resolutions being put into operation forthwith, the representatives of the allied Governments undertake to recommend that their respective Governments shall take, without delay, all the measures, whether temporary or permanent, requisite to giving full and complete effect to this policy forthwith, and to communicate to each other the decisions arrived at to attain the object.

APPENDIX B.

BRITISH CONTRABAND LIST—LIST OF ARTICLES DECLARED TO BE CONTRABAND OF WAR.

The articles declared to be contraband of war in the proclamations now in force have been arranged alphabetically in the accompanying list. It is hoped that this will be convenient to all parties concerned.

The list comprises the articles which have been declared to be absolute contraband as well as those which have been declared to be conditional contraband. The circumstances of the present war are so peculiar that His Majesty's Government consider that for practical purposes the distinction between the two classes of contraband has ceased to have any value. So large a proportion of the inhabitants of the enemy country are taking part, directly or indirectly, in the war that no real distinction can now be drawn between the armed forces and the civilian population. Similarly, the enemy Government has taken control, by a series of decrees and orders, of practically all the articles in the list of conditional contraband, so that they are now available for Government use. So long as these exceptional conditions continue our belligerent rights with respect to the two kinds of contraband are the same and our treatment of them must be identical.

THE CITY OF CINCINNATI.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, interest manifested by Members from time to time in the past concerning the city of Cincinnati and certain of her municipal enterprises and institutions is my justification in asking the indulgence of the House this afternoon.

Cincinnati is the oldest city in the United States west of the Allegheny Mountains, and is the largest city which can be properly described as central in relation to the whole population of the country, the center of population being not far west of Cincinnati. It is a manufacturing city surrounded by the richest and most prosperous agricultural district in the whole United States, and a glance at the map at once shows it to be the center of what will naturally form one of the new Federal land-bank districts.

The site of the city is probably the most picturesque of any in this country, and reminds the world tourist of those delightful sites along the historic Rhine. The city proper is situated on a large plateau elevated at a safe distance from the level of the beautiful Ohio River, which forms the southern boundary of the city, and borders the majestic hills of Kentucky, which form a fitting counterpart to the ridge of Cincinnati hills overlooking the lower plateau. These hills are much like the Seven Hills of Rome and form the residential districts, which are thus naturally separated from the industrial and city center. Cincinnati has just awakened to a realization of the rich endowment bequeathed her by nature. The hilly nature of the topography, with its picturesque waterways, offers attractive plots for parks, and a number of very expansive parks already beautify the city, while many more are embraced in the park plans and are being improved as rapidly as possible. The plateau of the downtown district has been dotted with children's playgrounds, and the boulevard plans provide for numerous boulevards, which are to be arteries radiating from the city to the suburban homes upon the hills.

The first ferroconcrete skyscraper in America was built in Cincinnati, and since that time many tall buildings have been erected, giving Cincinnati a truly metropolitan sky line; and one of these, the tallest building west of New York, is 34 stories high. The compactness of the buildings upon the plateau centralizes the city and makes it convenient for the residents and not difficult for the stranger to familiarize himself with the city.

The traction system, which is privately operated, is making some improvement in late years, notwithstanding the obstacles which the hilly nature of the surface offers. A new loop project has just been authorized, which will provide the much-needed rapid transit to the residential districts, the lack of which has been the largest factor in retarding the growth of the original Queen City of the West.

The gas and electric supply is also in the hands of private companies. Natural gas, piped from the fields of West Virginia, is furnished for heating and lighting at 30 cents per thousand feet, with special rates to large consumers. The introduction of natural gas and the activities of the smoke-abatement officials have done much to make Cincinnati a clean city in recent years.

The electric service and street lighting have all been greatly improved within the past few years and now rank with any other city in the Union. The electric rate to the private consumer is 8½ cents per kilowatt hour. While this rate is not so low as was desired by the citizens, it was a slight reduction from the previous rate, which was 10 cents per kilowatt hour.

The crowning glory of Cincinnati lies in its municipal achievements. It has embarked upon four great enterprises, two of which are most unusual in America and reflect the confidence which the people have in their own ability to construct and maintain great enterprises.

THE CINCINNATI SOUTHERN RAILROAD.

Under an act passed by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, May 4, 1869, the city built the Cincinnati Southern Railway, 336 miles long, extending from Cincinnati, Ohio, to Chattanooga, Tenn. This railway was built to open the southern markets to the city, and shows the enterprising character of her people. The total amount expended by the city for its construction was $18,300,000, but its total value to-day is over $40,000,000. The property is leased to the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway for 60 years, at an annual rental beginning with $1,050,000 and ending with $1,200,000. This annual rental sum is sufficient to pay the entire interest charges upon the bonded indebtedness, and in addition to apply over a half million dollars annually to the general interest fund of the city. In addition to the rental, the lessee is required to pay all taxes and assessments, to make all repairs, improvements, renewals, replacements, and additions, and to pay $12,000 annually to the trustees appointed on behalf of the city for the expenses of the trust.

THE UNIVERSITY.

Cincinnati early appreciated the advantages to be derived from placing the opportunity for a higher or professional education within the reach of all. The University of Cincinnati was established as a municipal institution in 1871. It has steadily grown from an academic college to a complete university, with its many technical and professional departments and its graduate school. The university has enrolled over 2,000 students, more than 1,500 of whom are residents of the city. At a recent investigation it was found that more than 1,000 of the resident students would have been denied the possibilities of a higher education had the city not offered the opportunity. The university is now an integral part of the city, for it furnishes the great majority of its professional men, teachers, and engineers, who are fast attaining leadership in their respective spheres. In 1913 the municipal reference bureau was organized under the department of political science, with quarters adjacent to the council chamber. This bureau furnishes the much-needed scientific cooperation between the city government, general public, and students. The university carries on courses in cooperative engineering, which system originated in Cincinnati, and it is destined to be the greatest among the modern educational developments. The basic philosophy of this great system is that whatever the people do, knowledge and skill should be wrought into the working organism of doing it. To instruct the students in the theory and then train them cooperatively in the practice is being successfully accomplished at this great university at the minimum cost to the student, who alternates two weeks at the university with two weeks in the shop or at the construction camp with pay. It will not be long before this excellent plan is adopted by other colleges which are fortunately situated in manufacturing communities. It has even been suggested that our Army College cooperate with the ordnance and munition factories so that the cadets may be better trained in the practical application of the instruments of war. This is an excellent suggestion and one which will ultimately prevail and reflect great credit upon the Nation.

THE WATERWORKS.

The city owns and operates an improved four-process, chemical-sterilization, water-filtering system which is second to none in the world. The water supply is drawn from the Ohio River at an intake 10 miles above, and the city is never endangered by a shortage. The installation of this great system, the estimated value of which is $17,366,561, was followed by a very marked decrease in the number of cases of typhoid fever and the mortality from that cause, the number of deaths decreasing from 239 in 1906 the year before the installation to 64 in 1908, the first year after the installation. The water rates, which are on the flat and meter basis, compare most favorably with other cities. The meter rate in the city is 8 cents per 100 cubic feet, while outside the city limits the rate is 8.8 cents per 100 cubic feet.

THE HOSPITAL.

Another monument to the unselfish character of the citizens is the Cincinnati Hospital, erected at a cost of over $4,000,000. This hospital is the most complete and finest municipal hospital in all the world.

The most valuable asset of which the city boasts is the character, integrity, and hospitality of her people. In Cincinnati the people are the city. It is the genial spirit of the Cincinnatian at home and abroad that has brought fame to his city. Cincinnati is not a city peopled with foreign born, but is a typical American city, with a lower percentage of foreign born than other large cities. Of the foreign born those coming from what is now the German Empire comprise the greatest percentage, but they only constituted 7.8 per cent at the 1910 census, the greatest majority of whom came to America when Germany was merely a group of independent States. As the Bavarian and Prussian of the former German States were fused into the loyal German of to-day, so the foreign-born German immigrant of Cincinnati has fused himself into the loyal American of to-day. In the census of 1910, 65.9 per cent of the total population were of German extraction, and they have inherited the conservative, provident, though hospitable, character of their forbears. The individual Cincinnatian is a home-loving person, and the beautiful residences throughout the city attest the truth of that statement. The homes owned free from encumbrance by the occupants comprise 14.8 per cent, while 7.8 per cent additional are owned by the occupants, although encumbered. The total assessed value of the taxable property in 1914 was $598,925,430, or $1,490 per capita.

The conservative buying ability for which the Cincinnatian is noted is the chief cause for the reduced cost of living as compared to other cities. In 1915 the average cost of fresh meats per pound was 19.23 cents, while in New York the same meats at the same time cost 21.06 cents, an increase of approximately 10 per cent. The average cost of a pound of vegetables and grain food was 0.048 cent, while the same products in New York cost 0.057 cent, or an increase of over 19 per cent. The retail price of dry goods and other necessaries, as shown by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, also reflects the conservative buying ability of the Cincinnatian.

Of the persons engaged in manufacture, 2.6 per cent are proprietors or firm members, 14.4 per cent salaried employees, and 83 per cent wage earners. The principal industries in which they are engaged are the manufacture of clothing, shoes, soap making, machinery, pork packing, brewing, distilling, printing, and publishing.

The growth of industrial Cincinnati has been solid and substantial. It has no mushroom industries the failure of which would disturb its growth. Its products reflect the conservative mind of the individual and their quality is known the world over. Life and industry itself are dependent upon its products, so that it would be the last city to suffer serious economic depression. In addition to its natural manufacturing facilities, the geographic position which it occupies as a commercial and distributive center is most important. It is the gateway of the South, and has extensive business connections therewith. While the city is a natural transportation center, its poor terminal accommodations, both steam and electric, have hampered the greater development to which she is justly entitled. The civic sentiment has been awakened to the need of such facilities, and it will not be long until they are forthcoming.

That the climate of Cincinnati is healthful and temperate is evidenced by the following meterological data:

Altitude above sea level: Weather Bureau office, 628 feet.

	Winter.	Spring.	Summer.	Autumn.	Annual.
Average temperature	32	52	74	55	53
Normal precipitation (inches and hundredths)	9.53	10.11	10.85	7.84	38.33
Percentage of humidity	75	65	66	69	69

The death rate for the white population is 15.2 per thousand, while the birth rate for the total population is 20 per thousand, showing a healthy, natural increase in population. The average number to a family in 1910 was 4.2, while the average for the whole of the United States was 4.5, showing that Cincinnati is close to the average. The improved water filtering system and the activities of the city health department have rendered great services in decreasing the death rate. The development of the suburban districts and the better transportation facilities have caused a decrease in the tenement inhabitants and an increase in the separate dwellings. This increase was further augumented by the tenement house reform laws, and the next census should show a pronounced trend to private dwellings.

Cincinnati offers unlimited opportunities for the development of all that is worth while and beautiful in life. Its elementary and graded schools have always been the pride of the city and the standard for others, both in the completeness of the buildings and the curriculum. Three imposing, commodious, and fully equipped high schools have been built in recent years, which reflect the generosity of her citizens and their appreciation for that which is best. These high schools are equipped for all modern educational requirements, and are the last word in school architecture. A graduate from the high schools can matriculate in the university without examination and continue his education to the highest obtainable without going beyond the confines of the city limits.

The varied industries in and about the city offer every opportunity to the most varied tastes. If by circumstances a citizen is compelled to work before completing his education, the same educational advantages are open, as there are evening courses in all the schools, including the university. Vocational education and all the regular studies are taught to the night classes as well as the day, so that the city is truly the paradise of the ambitious.

The wonderful economic development has but kept pace with the development of the finer arts in this glorious city. Heralded throughout the country as the music and art center of the Middle West many years ago, it still retains that distinction. Its numerous music colleges and art academy vie with the university in attracting outside talent, while the biennial May music festival and Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra bring increasing fame each year.

Cincinnati has not neglected to provide for the outlet of the lighter indulgences in life. No city takes greater care in providing well-regulated first-class amusement to its citizens, all of which are offered at the most popular prices. A stranger needs but to tarry awhile in Cincinnati to absorb the genial hospitality and acquire the care-free contentment of the Cincinnatian, which makes Cincinnati the talk of all the country.

Although Cincinnati is a metropolitan city, it has not sacrificed that community spirit which touches the heartstrings. The Cincinnatian does not live unto himself, but is an integral part of his surroundings, and is no more tortured by the busy hum of the city itself than is the free spirit of the surrounding hills.

The era of prosperity which is spreading over the country, engulfing all in its path, has not neglected Cincinnati, where business and bank clearings were never in a more prosperous condition. This period of unprecedented prosperity will give added impetus to the new era of progress which was planned and begun several years ago. The new belt-line loop and subway entrance which is to be built will cost $15,000,000, very nearly the same amount that was expended for the Cincinnati Southern Railway, which proved such a marked success and most profitable venture. The successful municipal achievements of Cincinnati speak volumes in themselves for the character and risk of the people who authorize them. The determination of 1869 to build the Southern Railway has justified the determination of 1916 to build the belt line rapid-transit loop and subway entrance; and no one doubts the success of the undertaking.

The visitor in Cincinnati is not only impressed with the advantages and beauty of the city, but with its great expanse of territory and large population. This is due to the fact that the city embraces a territory of 31,893 acres, and the population of the city in 1910 was 352,591. However, the population of the large and well-populated outlying territory which, with the city proper, comprises the metropolitan district, was 563,804. This outlying territory, for all purposes, is just as much a part of Cincinnati as the city itself, but because of political divisions is not included within the city limits.

After lingering in Cincinnati a short while you little wonder at the inspiration that filled the heart of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow when he wrote the following verse upon the occasion of his visit there:

This greeting of mine
The winds and birds shall deliver
To the Queen of the West,
In her garlands dressed,
On the banks of the beautiful river.

[Applause.]

THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, four years more of national life have rolled by, and again we find ourselves in the midst of a great campaign for the selection of a President of the Republic. Four years of transcendant world-wide influence these have been. As we look back upon the momentous history of this short period, and then look forward to whatever the future may hold in store for us, we can not fail to appreciate the part our own country has played in the shifting scenes of international life.

Scarcely any period of similar length in the world's entire history has been fraught with such tremendous problems of human interest. Scarcely any other period in the world's history has brought forth such an array of domestic and international questions for quick and just solution as have confronted every nation on this planet, whether at peace or in war.

Surely no similar period in the history of our own country approaches the past four years in the number and complexity of its paramount problems in the field alike of domestic and international politics. And the question which the voters of this Nation will be called upon to settle on the 7th day of next November is whether the manner in which these questions have been met and settled has been in accordance with their desires, in conformity to the principles of our Nation, and in keeping with the traditions of our past; whether the administration of Woodrow Wilson and those who have labored with him shall be indorsed and continued for another four years, or retired to make place for one whose only weapon is blind criticism and whose only platform is empty pretense and transparent hypocrisy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

So far as the Democrats are concerned, we enter this fight with a confidence born of the knowledge of pledges kept and of promises fulfilled, and because we believe in both the intelligence and the justice of the American people. If the administration of Woodrow Wilson, by every humanely conceivable test, does not deserve the overwhelming approval of the people of this Republic, then it were vain for Presidents or Congresses to attempt to give audible articulation to the people's yearnings or crystallize their wishes into the law of statutes.

Political parties are of no value in a nation's life unless they are made instrumentalities to be used for the welfare of the people. And when a party ceases to give freedom and fullness to the spirit of national hopes, it is no longer capable of service to the Nation. This has been true since the foundation of the Republic, and will continue to be true so long as we are a free and self-governing people. Consequently the road of our national life from the beginning is strewn with the wrecks of dead political parties, which died because they no longer represented or served the people. The Democratic Party is the only party whose existence is coextensive with the life of the Nation, and it has been so because the Democratic Party has always been the servant of the people, the champion of human conscience, liberty, and achievement.

To-day we behold the Democratic Party triumphant and militant, proud of its past, confident of its future, representative of the best progressive thought of the day, and the only political organization now left in the field both capable and willing to translate that thought into action for the solution of the problems of men and women who sit by the firesides of this land and dream of better days for themselves and for their children. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In support of this assertion I summon the history of the recent past.

When the Democratic Party came into power on March 4, 1913, it did not come representing reaction. It did not come representing special privilege. It did not come representing a secret alliance between big business and big policies, with a pipeline from the Treasury Department into the headquarters of both. It did not come as a special pleader for organized greed. It came to perform the herculean task of cleaning the Augean stables, left gorged by the accumulations of 16 years. It came with a commission to rechart the political seas and to give new direction and steadiness of course to our ship of state. How well those tasks have been performed we shall leave to the verdict of the people and to the truth of history.

We have been amused and entertained, as our opponents no doubt have been embarrassed, at their efforts to discover some "dominant" issue which the American people could see without a microscope. After it had been announced that the alliterative Senator from Ohio was to be the chairman of the Republican convention at Chicago, we observed that gentleman sailing nervously through the air like a familiar bird, seeking some well-known, though lifeless, object upon which he might lay hold. Alighting with ease and grace upon the fence, his eye beheld the tariff, and soon from his proximity came forth an utterance that the tariff would be the overshadowing issue in this campaign, even as it had been in ancient days among the "founding fathers." But to his dismay he soon discovered that as an "issue" with which to attempt to beguile the American voter into voting against the administration of President Wilson it had neither form nor substance.

When this administration assumed the reins of government in 1913 it was pledged to a revision of the tariff. Not a revision upward, as the Republicans in Congress had always revised it. Not a revision in the interest of monopolies which had already fed too long upon Government favoritism. Not a revision dictated by contributors to campaign funds. But it came pledged to a revision which should be the expression of an honest taxing system, adjusting the burdens of taxation somewhat in accordance with ability to pay. The result of this first task undertaken by the Democratic Party has been more successful than its most enthusiastic supporters anticipated. The Underwood tariff not only reduced the taxes upon the necessaries of life, but provided for an income tax which compels the wealth of the Nation to bear its just share of the expenses of conducting this Government. This income tax during the last fiscal year brought to the United States Treasury more than $124,000,000, to replace unjust and burdensome taxes formerly levied from the earnings of the poor. And while the Republicans predicted its utter failure as a producer of revenue for the Government and prophesied universal disaster to the business of the country, the fact remains that no period in the history of this Nation has witnessed such prosperity as now exists and has existed since this law became effective, and instead of being a failure as a revenue producer it left a surplus in the Treasury for the last fiscal year of more than $78,000,000, the greatest surplus since that of 1908. The total ordinary receipts of the United States Treasury for the year 1908, under Roosevelt's administration, amounted to $601,060,723.27; for 1912, under Taft's administration, $691,778,465.37; for 1916, under Wilson's administration, $777,480,487.96.

If the amount of a little over $42,000,000 collected from stamp taxes and other war-tax items which will be repealed by the pending revenue bill is subtracted from the figures for 1916, it still leaves a greater sum collected from tariff taxes, incomes, and internal revenue than was collected under the administrations of Roosevelt or Taft; another important difference being that under this Democratic administration a great portion of it was collected from sources which under these former administrations escaped their proper share of the expenses of the Government under which they live.

Does the Republican Party propose to repeal this law if it should be returned to power and reenact the discredited Payne-Aldrich law of unholy memory? Do they propose to repeal the income tax, which is the most just and equitable form of taxation ever devised, because it is a tax on wealth instead of a tax on consumption? It was the persistent and constant agitation of the Democratic Party that brought about the enactment of this law. While governor of New York, Mr. Hughes, now the Republican nominee for President, opposed the income-tax amendment to the Constitution and prevented the New York Legislature from ratifying it, and it was not ratified by that State until a Democratic legislature was elected and responded to the will of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Will Mr. Hughes be against the income tax if he is elected President as he was while governor of New York? Will he ask for its repeal? Will he veto any bill repealing it? If it is to be retained as a part of the taxing system, will he want it made heavier upon the comparatively poor and lighter upon the wealthy population of the country like my friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and other equally hidebound Republicans? Perhaps when Mr. Hughes has finished searching for an "issue" in the recesses of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, concerning which the arousal and indignation of the average voter is in proportion to his knowledge on the subject, he may find time to reply to these and other equally important and no doubt embarrassing questions.

After the enactment of the best tariff bill ever placed upon the statutes the Democratic administration might well have rested upon its laurels, knowing it had performed well the duty for which the extra session of Congress had been assembled. But the task of regeneration was scarcely begun. For more than a generation the people of this Nation had been clamoring for a modern banking and currency system. From the field, the factory, the workshop, from the merchant, the banker, and the professional man—from every source an increasing and constant demand had arisen for the reform of our archaic and out-of-date banking and currency laws. For 16 years the Republican administrations, one after another, had heard this call, but had not answered. For 16 years the Republican administrations had witnessed the contortions through which business and industry attempted to extricate themselves from the baneful effects of restricted credit and centralization of both credit and money. Still they turned no effective wheel for their relief. Whether this inactivity was due to a lack of desire or lack of intelligence is immaterial. The fact remains that during that period we witnessed business depression, financial stringency, depreciation of property, panic, and all the financial ills that follow in the footsteps of centralized control. These things the Republican administrations observed, because they occurred at their doorstep. Yet no remedy, scarcely any attempt at remedy, was forthcoming under them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Before the administration of Woodrow Wilson and the Democratic Party was one year in office a modern, scientific, and adequate banking and currency law was enacted, proclaiming anew the democracy of credit and withdrawing from the hands of private interests the power to control the financial policy of this Nation and placing that power in the Government of the people. To such an extent has this law infused new life into the business and commercial world that all men of every walk are now unanimous in proclaiming it the greatest piece of constructive legislation enacted in 50 years. At no time in the history of this Nation have our financial institutions been stronger than since this law became operative. Confidence has been restored. Sources of credit hitherto locked into disuse have been revealed and made available for the demands of commerce. And notwithstanding the great war that suddenly burst upon the world in August, 1914, severed the arteries of trade in every quarter of the globe, this system inaugurated by the Democratic Party under the leadership of its great President enabled this Nation to weather that storm and find anchor in the safety of financial security. Under this law America has ceased to be a debtor Nation and for the first time in our history we are enabled to dictate the financial policy of the world, compelling other nations to come to us for the money which hitherto we have sought from them.

Will the Republicans repeal or emasculate this law if they should by any misadventure be successful in the coming election? They did not dare to condemn it in their platform. Candidate Hughes has not had the temerity to assail it, although there is hope that when his enthusiasm over Santo Domingo has subsided he may devote some time to telling the people where he stands on the really important questions about which the people desire information.

Having completed the second task which this administration had set for itself, a third rose up to demand solution with equal directness, zeal, and patriotism as had been applied in those which went before. We had heard much in this country about trusts and monopolies, fostered under the administrations of the Republican Party. We had heard the complaint that business did not know what the law was and consequently found itself violating it without intention. We had seen much noise and confusion applied to the prosecution of criminal cases involving interpretations of the antitrust laws, which prosecutions, together with the noise and confusion, were contemporaneous with the multiplied increase in these same trusts and monopolies. Business men had begun to ask for the creation of some tribunal before which they might go and before which the people might go for the redress of those grievances which were so slow of just determination in the courts of the land. The swelling volume of insistence upon a clarification of the uncertainties of the Sherman antitrust law became more audible each recurring year. The people knocked at the door of Republican administrations, but there was no response. Labor also knocked at that door, asking to be granted a legal status, asking that the toil of their hands and the sweat of their brow be not regarded as a lifeless commodity. Here, again, the Republican administrations were equally deaf and dumb. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But in less than 18 months after the inauguration of Woodrow Wilson the antitrust laws had been amended to give impetus to honest business and lay the ax to the roots of dishonest business. A Federal Trade Commission had been created, before which both business and the Government, and the people who form the Government, might go for redress of long-standing grievances, for the adjustment of manifest wrongs. And in these enactments the Democratic Party wrote for the first time the doctrine that human labor is not a commodity, not a thing to be made the football of cruel or designing men. The Democratic Party wrote into these enactments provisions which protect the laboring man, whether in field or workshop, in the pursuit of his lawful objects, in the betterment of his condition and the condition of his fellow man. And thus the Democratic Party again demonstrated the fact that it is the friend of labor, the friend of lawful and honest business, and that instead of seeking to tear down and destroy the commercial fabric of this Nation it has applied the healing processes of reform under which confusion and friction have been largely eliminated.

If successful will the Republican Party repeal or weaken these laws? Will they abolish the Trade Commission, which has already in a thousand ways justified its creation? Will they repeal the law prohibiting the interlocking of directorates in great corporations? Will they repeal the provision of the antitrust law giving to labor its legal status, its charter of human rights? Neither in the Republican platform nor in any speech thus far made by the Republican candidate, Mr. Hughes, have these Democratic enactments been assailed. In a speech at Detroit a few days ago Mr. Hughes, rubbing his eyes as if just aroused from a long and fretful slumber, announced to an expectant world, as if newly discovered by him, the doctrine that "human labor is not a commodity." If he had kept himself informed, he would have known that two years ago under the dome of that same building in which he took refuge from the political bosses of New York the Democratic Party had crystallized that sentiment into statute law, which neither he nor his party will dare repeal, although opposing it at the time of its enactment.

In addition to the provisions of the antitrust laws in behalf of labor the Democratic Party has enacted other wholesome legislation for the benefit of those who toil since its advent into power. It created the Department of Labor, to be presided over by a member of the Cabinet, and President Wilson appointed to that position as its first Secretary a man who had come up as a laboring man and who has won a place not only in the hearts of those who toil but of the people of the entire country. We have passed an eight-hour law to be applied upon work done by the Government as well as work done by others for the Government.

We passed a law creating a Children's Bureau, to promote the welfare of the children of this Nation, who are to be the men and women of to-morrow.

We have also passed an eight-hour law for working women in the District of Columbia, legislation over which Congress has jurisdiction. We passed laws creating an Industrial Commission to investigate the conditions of employment throughout the country; laws amending the act creating the Bureau of Mines, affording better protection against accidents to those engaged in mining labor; laws prohibiting the importation of articles from foreign countries produced by convict, pauper, or detained labor; a law known as the seaman's bill, designed to improve the condition of seamen and to promote the safety of travel; a law permitting appeals to the United States Supreme Court from decisions of State courts declaring labor statutes unconstitutional; laws to promote the safety of employees and travelers on railroads by equipping railroad engines with suitable boilers, and also a law providing for more complete and adequate inspection of boilers and engines by competent inspectors employed by the Government; and laws regulating the hours of service for employees engaged in the transportation of interstate commerce.

We have also passed a law creating the Board of Mediation and Conciliation in disputes between employers and employees, which has already adjusted many important controversies involving questions of compensation, labor conditions, and hours of service, and which bids fair to be of still greater service in the future.

We have passed a child-labor law preventing the shipment in interstate commerce of articles produced or manufactured in mines or quarries employing children under 16 years of age, or in factories, mills, workshops, or manufacturing establishments employing children under 14 years of age. The Democratic Party recognizes the value of the child life of this Nation. It seeks to conserve it, to educate it, and to afford it conditions of inspiration at a period when it should be in school or on the playground instead of being sacrificed upon the altar of greed.

We have also enacted a fair and just workman's compensation law for the employees of the United States Government, applying to the army of Government employees the same humane principles now demanded of private employers; and it is the hope of this administration and of the Democratic Party to bring about the speedy enactment of a general workman's compensation law for all employees over whom Congress has jurisdiction to legislate.

What a record of achievement in behalf of the toiling masses of this Nation! Has any other party, or any other administration, ever remotely approached it? We challenge the Republican Party, and particularly do we challenge the Republican candidate for President, to point to greater or to equal accomplishment by them or by him. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Woodrow Wilson and the Democratic Party in Congress have also recognized their duty to the farmers of the United States. Perceiving the self-evident fact that no nation can be truly prosperous that ignores the welfare of those who till the soil, this administration has done more than any other administration in the history of this Republic to advance the financial, social, and agricultural interests of the farmers. In addition to broadening the field and scope of the work of the Department of Agriculture, this administration has passed the agricultural-extension bill, designed to bring the National and State Governments into closer cooperation in bringing home to the farmer's attention the advantages of scientific knowledge of farming, and this cooperation is already having its effect in establishing more modern and economic methods of growing and marketing the products of the farm.

Further to enhance the interests of rural life, and seeking to bring the market, the church, and the schoolhouse in more easy and convenient reach of the farmer, we have enacted a law granting Federal aid in the construction and maintenance of good roads throughout the land; and during the next five years provision is made for the expenditure by the United States Government of $85,000,000 in cooperation with the States in the building of good roads. I call upon the Republican Members of Congress to point to any effort on their part to give substantial aid to the enterprises of the farm. The only attention Republican administrations have ever paid to the farmer was to tax him, and then try to fool him into the belief that he was being protected by a tariff on wheat which was never imported, and other similar exhibitions of buncombe.

We have also recently enacted, and the President has signed, a rural-credits bill, or farm-loan bill, designed to afford a source of credit to the farmer at low rates of interest and for long periods of time. For many years there has been a desire among the people for the enactment of such a law. Agricultural development has been hobbled because the farmer had never been provided with a system of credits suitable for his demands, and because he was compelled to borrow money from the same sources and upon the same terms as those who were prepared to make quick and frequent payments, he found himself handicapped. This handicap has retarded agricultural enterprise in many sections of the country, until a demand arose for the enactment of a law that would give to the American farmer some of the advantages long enjoyed by the farmers of Europe in the way of securing cheaper money on easier terms of payment. No Republican administration even attempted to respond to this demand. All the Republican Party has ever been able or willing to do for any class of our people was to invoke the convenient spirit of the protective tariff. If business demanded greater opportunity and better laws, the Republican Party answered by a protective tariff. If labor, agriculture, commerce, shipping, the professions, the arts, and sciences, or any other human activity called for reform or stimulation, the Republican administrations handed them the protective tariff, claiming that it, like Buncombe's pills, was a cure for every human ill.

By the enactment of this law it is believed a long step has been taken in the direction of solving the difficult problems of rural credit, and while the Republican platform seeks to criticize this Democratic law by indirection, only 10 Republican Members of the House of Representatives could be found who had the courage to vote against it and face the people.

In the light of these performances, and many others to which I might advert if time permitted, can there be any doubt concerning the willingness or the ability of the Democratic Party to interpret the will of the people and translate that will into law? Can there be any doubt that the Democratic Party is the really constructive party of the Nation? Can there be any justification for the Republican slander that the Democratic Party is a party of negation, or that it is the enemy of the legitimate commercial and industrial enterprises of the United States? Surely, in the light of the Republican membership of Congress, who have exhausted themselves finding fault, who have worked overtime seeking on the most flimsy pretexts to discredit the great administration of President Wilson, and who have offered nothing even faintly resembling a constructive policy, it can no longer be said, if in truth it ever could have been, that the great Democratic Party is not possessed of constructive statesmanship, or that it does not keep step with the tread of the Nation's progress.

Not only can the Wilson administration point to this matchless array of substantial legislation concerning particularly our domestic and economic welfare, but also it can point to the beginning of the reestablishment of our merchant marine by the passage of the shipping bill, which will give fresh hope and life to our growing foreign trade and facilitate the transportation of our products to the markets of the world. One of the humiliating embarrassments which we have been compelled to view in recent years has been our absolute dependence upon foreign nations to carry our commerce to the family of nations. There was a time when the American flag floated on the high seas in every quarter of the globe, representing the industry, the genius, and the productive ability of our people. While the Republican party was in power it saw this flag disappear and wasted its time talking ship subsidy. When the European war began we were completely at the mercy of foreign merchant vessels, and we are still dependent to a large extent upon the ships of other nations to get our commerce to foreign markets. For the purpose of reestablishing the Nation's flag upon the ships of commerce which shall carry our trade to those who await our coming, this administration has set in motion a process by which our merchant marine may be rehabilitated. As a Democrat I rejoice in the efforts of President Wilson and the Democratic Party to include in the unparalleled accomplishments of the past four years this great and substantial legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Before the adjournment of this session of Congress there will have been created a nonpartisan Tariff Commission for the investigation and assembling of information concerning trade conditions of the world for submission to Congress for use in the adjustment of the tariff. This commission will be empowered and expected to gather scientific facts and information from every available source having any bearing on the fixing of tariff rates, so that as far as possible such rates may be adjusted in accordance with proper standards of just taxation and business administration. Although the Republicans in Congress have in the past professed to favor such a commission, all except 39 of them voted against this bill when it was before the House of Representatives a few weeks ago.

During the past two years, since the outbreak of the war in Europe, there has been much consideration in this country given to the question of national defense. There have been extremes—demanding on the one hand absurd programs of military and naval expenditures, and on the other hand no expenditures at all. There have been some among us who have desired to inaugurate a policy of militarism fashioned after the systems of the Old World, and others who seemed to be content with a program somewhat Chinese in its proportions. It has been the duty of President Wilson and his advisers to ascertain the real needs of the Army and Navy and to recommend and urge upon Congress a program sufficient for the needs of the future, while yet preserving the ancient traditions of our Republic.

After great investigation, prolonged hearings, and debate extending into the whole realm of military and naval history, this Congress, under the leadership of the Democratic Party, has brought to completion the most comprehensive program of military reorganization and naval construction ever undertaken or contemplated by previous administrations. The question of preparation for national defense is not a partisan question. All men desire that we shall be adequately prepared to meet every emergency which may arise in our dealings with other nations. No man who is a patriot and who cherishes the institutions under which he lives would want our substantial rights trampled under foot. No man who believes in the destiny of this Nation as the moral and intellectual light of the world would want to see us fail in the performance of our obligations to ourselves or to others who have a right to look to us for the preservation of national liberties. But if we have been unprepared for these emergencies, it has not been the fault of the Democratic Party. If our standing army has been below the requirements of the law, it can not be laid at our door. If our Navy has slipped down from second to fourth place among the navies of the world, it can not be charged to our account. At no time in our history, in a time of peace, has the Army been in better condition from the standpoint of equipment, efficiency, morale, and numerical strength than at the present time, under the guidance of this administration. In the year 1901 our expenditures for the Navy amounted to more than $61,000,000. Under the administrations of the Republican Party it had increased to $133,000,000 in 1912. In 1901 our Navy was the second largest navy in the world. In 1912 they tell us it had gone back to fourth place. If the statesmen of the Republican Party possessed that foresight which they have always claimed for themselves, how can they escape condemnation for permitting the American Navy, which has always been the pride of the Nation, to fall back to fourth place among the navies of the world? But candidate Hughes tells us that President Wilson has been a follower and not a leader in the demand for national defense. It will be noted, however, that he has not been a follower of the Republican Party, which allowed our Navy to go backward instead of forward.

Under the leadership of this administration, it will be restored to its former position among the nations of the world, and it will be made adequate for every requirement of national honor, national security, and national prestige. Already under the efficient administration of Secretary Daniels, according to the testimony of impartial experts, both American and foreign, and falsifiers and sensational busybodies to the contrary notwithstanding, our Navy has attained an efficiency never excelled, if ever equaled, in its long and glorious history. Secretary Daniels has been able to secure enlistments in the Navy more nearly reaching the full requirements of the law than any other Secretary in recent years, and when the full and truthful history of his administration shall be known to the public, as it will be and is already known to many, the American sense of fair play and justice will demand acknowledgment of the fact that no head of that department ever brought to it a higher sense of official responsibility, or a more honorable conception of his duty to the people.

In view of these achievements, in the face of the confidence and assurance the unmatched record of this administration has established in the esteem of the American people, is it any wonder that we are now in the midst of a prosperity never approached before? Is it any wonder that the candidate of the Republican Party in his extremity strains at every political gnat that chances to fly his way? Is it any wonder that in the trip he is now making across the country he assumes the attitude of the pettifogger in order to try to blind the people to the wonderful achievements of this administration? Is it any wonder that Mr. Hughes, seeing all about him, under a Democratic administration, evidences of the most marvelous record of universal prosperity chronicled in modern times, shouts through the streets and alleys, and into the ears of contented labor and rewarded business, "It is only temporary," preferring that his doleful prophesy should be realized rather than that the American people may continue to prosper? Heretofore the Republican leaders have proclaimed prosperity as their peculiar offspring; and whenever they have found it alive and healthy under any other roof, they have either pretended that it did not exist or have charged it with an alien parentage. In the present circumstances they not only charge an alien parentage, but proclaim impending dissolution. Whether this attitude is an example of "dominant ineptitude" or "firm" and "unflinching incertitude" it is difficult at this juncture to determine.

Heretofore the Republican leaders have told us that Democratic success would bring disaster and panic. But in the midst of the mightiest conflict that ever drenched this world in human blood; in the midst of shattered ideals, of lands laid waste, of homes made desolate, of credit strained in every other quarter of the world; in the midst of hate and brutal strife, amid the cry of war widows and battle orphans, our people thrive and are at peace, and out of the abundance of that thrift they send relief to stricken Europe and pray a speedy end to war. No panic has come. Labor everywhere finds employment. Business expands and is rewarded. Enterprise, industry, and ingenuity all awake with the break of day to set new tasks and make new records of achievement. The dinner pail is full. Our hearts are full—full of gratitude to a Providence which has vouchsafed to us a leadership whose foresight, courage, and patience have made possible the enjoyment of peace in the midst of prosperity. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is almost impossible to comprehend the tremendous strides we have made in the accumulation of wealth, in the circulation of money, in the volume of business, both foreign and domestic, during the past four years.

According to the official report of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, recently given to the public, our exports for the year ending June 30, 1916, amounted to $4,345,000,000, an increase of $1,576,000,000 over our exports for the previous year.

The imports for the year ending June 30, 1916, amounted to the sum of $2,165,000,000, an increase over the figures for the previous year of $1,070,580,400.

It is claimed by the Republican leaders that this great increase in our foreign trade is due to shipments of munitions of war to the belligerent nations of Europe; but an examination of the facts is only necessary to refute this statement. While it is true that shipments of munitions of war have greatly increased since the beginning of the conflict in Europe, it is idle and ridiculous to claim that our great and universal prosperity is entirely or even largely due to this character of foreign trade.

Enormous as our foreign trade has been in every branch of commerce, it must be remembered that our foreign trade is less than 5 per cent of our domestic trade. Less than 3 per cent of the total value of manufactures in the United States for the past 12 months represented munitions of war, and decidedly less than 10 per cent of our total exports was made up of war materials. If the total value of exports of munitions of war were subtracted from the total of our exports, it would still leave a balance in our favor greater than existed for any year under a Republican administration.

The prosperity which now abounds is nation wide and is not dependent upon trade in war materials; and, strange to say, that State which produces the greatest proportion of these substances shows the smallest percentage in growth.

According to tabulated reports received from the Interstate Commerce Commission, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, 93 great railroad systems in the United States increased their net earnings over those of the previous year by the enormous amount of $184,368,933; and for the single month of June, 1916, their net earnings increased over those of the same month in 1915 by the sum of $11,624,110. The increase in net income for the year by these roads amounted to $1,687 per mile; and if the same proportion of increase for the other railroads of the country was obtained, which we have every reason to believe, the total increase in net earnings would amount to the sum of $435,000,000, notwithstanding an increase in operating expenses of approximately $240,000,000 for the same period.

While our Republican friends and their candidate for President seem to hope that our prosperity is only temporary, the business and manufacturing world appear to take a different view of the situation. The Bethlehem Steel Co. has just announced it will immediately expend the sum of $70,000,000 in improvements and extensions of newly purchased plants in the United States for the manufacture of various lines of finished steel for manufacturing and commercial purposes. This company is controlled by Charles M. Schwab, and is a competitor of the United States Steel Corporation and of the Jones & Laughlin Steel Co.

It has been announced from authoritative sources that the shipbuilding industry of the United States for the present year will exceed that of all the balance of the world for the first time in 50 years. The total output for the year will be 351 vessels, with a total tonnage of 672,106 gross tons. The total output for the first six months of the present year was more than 300,000 gross tonnage, more than the total for either the years 1914 or 1915. Does this activity give evidence of the temporary nature of our enormous commerce under this Democratic administration? We would be glad for Mr. Hughes to answer specifically with facts, but he will not.

On May 1, 1916, according to reports received by the Comptroller of the Currency, the gross deposits of the 7,578 national banks in the United States were $11,135,322,000. This was under the present Democratic administration. On the corresponding date in the year 1912, under the Taft Republican administration, they amounted to $8,015,511,000, the gain for the four years of Democratic supremacy being $3,119,811,000, or approximately 39 per cent. These increases were recorded in every section of the land, from Maine to California and from Puget Sound to the capes of Florida. Nor does this include the increases in deposits in State banks and trust companies, in savings banks, and in the postal savings banks, increases in all of which have been equally gratifying.

Not only have the deposits increased, but the number of depositors has increased in equal proportion, and the amount of money in circulation in the United States has constantly grown under the operation of the constructive legislation and Executive policies of the Democratic Party. The amount of money in circulation on July 1, 1908, under Roosevelt, was $34.74 per capita. On the same date in the year 1912, under Taft, the per capita of money in circulation was $34.34. But on July 1, 1916, under the administration of Woodrow Wilson, the amount of money in circulation for every man, woman, and child in the United States was $39.23, the total amount being $4,018,043,555.

The total amount of bank clearings for the first six months of 1912, under Taft, was $85,100,000,000. For the first six months of 1916, under Wilson, bank clearings had mounted to the sum of $118,890,000,000, or a gain in four years of approximately 40 per cent. In addition to all this, the total wealth of the United States increased from $187,000,000,000 in 1912, under Taft, to the present figures of $228,000,000,000, representing a gain in four years of more than 21 per cent.

During the present year, so far as the figures can be obtained, there have been increases of wages to labor amounting to more than $300,000,000, showing that the business revival and the increasing prosperity of this country is being shared by men in every walk of life.

Observing, as they must, the contentment of the people, the curling smoke of industry, the hum of busy spindles, and the rush of men through the congested marts of trade, and being unable to erase the unparalleled record of progressive legislation and governmental reforms to which a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress lay just and honorable claim, is it any wonder that the Republican Party and the Republican candidate for President find themselves with nothing but sham, pretense, and hollow declamation to submit to the people in their behalf? Is it any wonder that Mr. Hughes is now seeking to blind the people to these achievements by the cheap criticism of the demogogue and vague and meaningless dissertations upon "undiluted Americanism," "firm and unflinching consistency," and other equally platitudinous "incertitudes"? [Applause on the Demorcatic side.]

But, Mr. Speaker, we are told by the Republican leaders that the Democratic Party is not a national party, but that it is a sectional party, and that as such it has been sectional in its conduct of the Government. We are told by them that the Republican Party is the only really national party in this Nation. Arrogance has ever been the dominant quality of these presumptive leaders, but at a time like this we might have hoped that even that quality would not have been so ready to assert itself. But I am ready to refute the claim set out by them, and in support of that refutation I point to the record of history, both past and present.

The Democratic Party is the only party now in existence which has outlived every conflict, every depression, every vicissitude which has beset our national pathway. Whether in war or peace, whether in prosperity or adversity, whether in the sunless valley or on the peaks where the white light shines eternal, the Democratic Party has been the friend of liberty, the mouthpiece of conscience, and the crusader for the rights of mankind. It is to-day the dominant political party of this Nation, in whose history there is no break, in whose ancestry there is no cause for shame. Other parties have come and gone, and their several wrecks may be found in the graveyards of political history. Not so with Democracy, unterrified and undefiled. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There are 10 States in this Union which now have not a single Republican Member of the House of Representatives, these 10 States having a total membership in this body of 77. The Democratic vote in these 10 States in 1912 was 707,184; the Republican vote was 99,764. These 10 States are Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montana, South Carolina, and Texas.

There are also 10 States in this Union which now have no Democratic Member of this House, but the total membership of these 10 States in this body is only 22. The Republican vote in these States in 1912 was 266,616, while the total vote of the Democratic Party in those States was 296,539. These States are Connecticut, Delaware, Idaho, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oregon, Vermont, and Wyoming.

Not a national party! The State of Indiana alone in that year had more Democratic votes (281,890) than there were Republican votes in all of the last-named States.

Not a national party! In that year the State of New York alone had more Democratic votes (655,477) than there were Republican votes in all 20 of the States mentioned above, with Kentucky, Tennessee, North Carolina, and Kansas added.

Not a national party! Illinois and Ohio in that year had more Democratic votes (828,200) than there were Republican votes in all 24 of the above States, plus the States of Oklahoma and New Jersey (824,840).

Not a national party! In that year Illinois alone had more Democratic votes (405,048) than the 20 States named, plus Rhode Island and Nevada (397,279). Wisconsin had more Democratic votes (164,409) than there were Republicans in the 10 States represented here wholly by Democrats, plus the States of Wyoming, Vermont, Delaware, and New Mexico (161,356). [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But this is not the whole story, Mr. Speaker, of the national scope of the Democratic Party. There are 48 States in this Union. Out of the 48 there are 22 that have no Republican Member of the Senate of the United States, while there are only 14 States in the Union that have no Democratic Member of the Senate. Which party in the United States Senate appears to be the most national in its scope? Twenty-two States, with a total membership of 44 in the Senate, and not a Republican among them. Only 14 States without a Democratic Senator. The total Democratic vote in the States represented in the Senate wholly by Democrats was 2,503,970; while the total Republican vote in the 14 States represented in the Senate wholly by Republicans was only 811,072. The States referred to as being represented entirely by Democratic Senators are Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nevada, New Jersey, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.

The States referred to as being represented entirely by Republican Senators are Connecticut, Idaho, Iowa, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, New Mexico, North Dakota, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Utah, Vermont, Washington, and Wyoming.

The remaining 12 States of California, Delaware, Illinois, Kansas, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, South Dakota, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Maine are represented by one Republican and one Democratic Senator, except Maine, which now has only a Democrat in the Senate, Senator Burleigh, the Republican, having recently died.

I deem it unnecessary to go further into the facts to demonstrate that the Democratic Party is not only a national party but in truth is the only national party having either the power or the disposition to represent every section of this fair land and write the will of the people into law. Not only is it national in extent of area and distribution of its votes, but it is truly national in its aspirations, in its sympathies, in its conception of free and enlightened government, and the destiny of this Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Again, we are told by the Republican reactionaries that President Wilson is a "minority President," meaning thereby that he did not receive a majority of all the votes cast in the presidential election of 1912. Since the year 1828, when first the popular vote began to be recorded, there have been nine so-called "minority Presidents." James K. Polk was a minority President, as were also Zachary Taylor, James Buchanan, Hayes, Garfield, Cleveland, and Benjamin Harrison. The great Lincoln himself was a "minority President," during his first term, for he did not receive a majority of all the votes cast in the election of 1860. But at the end of his first term in 1864 he ceased to be a "minority President," was overwhelmingly reelected and became a "majority President," just as Woodrow Wilson will be overwhelmingly reelected in 1916 and become a "majority President" for the next four years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Again, they tell us that we have been extravagant and wasteful of the people's money. But, Mr. Speaker, while no administration in all our history has been more active in promoting those agencies which were necessary for the efficient conduct of the Government, the increase in expenditures during this administration has been less than that of any Republican administration of recent years, notwithstanding this administration has been compelled to deal with extraordinary conditions never existing heretofore. New agencies of Government for carrying out the mandates of the people have been created, new forces set in motion, and new goals set for our future achievements never undertaken by Republican administrations. Besides these domestic concerns, new and delicate international considerations have arisen on this and other continents which have compelled the use of funds never required in former times. Yet, notwithstanding these extraordinary conditions, the increase in expenditures from 1912 to 1916, two years under Taft and two years under Wilson, has been only $39,948,064, or 6½ per cent, while the increase from 1908 to 1911, two years under Roosevelt and two years under Taft, was $107,986,351, or 20 per cent.

The average per capita expense for conducting this Government under the first three years of President Taft was $7.03; while the average per capita expense for conducting the Government under the first three years of President Wilson's term has been only $6.97. For the year 1912, under Mr. Taft, the per capita expense of conducting the Government was $6.84; while under President Wilson for the year 1916 the per capita expense for conducting the Government was only $6.74.

But what of the Republican record? What of the pretense and humbuggery of the old guard, headed by PENROSE, by Crane, by LODGE, and CANNON, and other equally immovable statesmen whom Roosevelt four short years ago described as porch climbers and thieves? Will the people of this Nation repudiate a President and a Congress who have advanced the outposts of progressive government far beyond the hopes of optimism, only to replace them with one who speaks the language only of reaction and stupid assault? Four years ago a great majority of the Republican vote of this Nation withdrew from that party because of the hopelessness of any conceivable progress under the domination of the bosses of Republicanism. Is there any greater hope now that these same bosses, in order to clothe their schemes in apparent respectability, have invaded the Supreme Court for a candidate, hoping thus to conceal their manifest unworthiness under the folds of the judicial robe? And surely since that nomination has been made and the sphinx has become audible it can not be said that the expectant people who mistook silence for wisdom and solemn countenance for ability have anything to hope for from that source. The mountain labored and a sickly mouse came forth, and since the event those who staged the play and set the scenes have discovered to their dismay that he who before nomination grew in stature in proportion to his silence has since the nomination continued to shrink in proportion to the frequency of his utterances. Utterly bereft of moral or intellectual solvency themselves, these leaders of the Republicanism of Quay and Hanna approach through the subway the strained and eager ear of a justice of the Supreme Court with soothing words. And scarcely has the robe of sacred office fallen from his shoulders before a statement, long prepared and waiting, emerges from the reservoir of congested wisdom, revealing its author as a politician, dominant and undiluted.

While we do not wish to be understood as criticizing the Republican bosses for going to the Supreme Court for their candidate, since they were compelled to find one who had said nothing on any subject for at least six years, we may well question the judgment or discretion of a man who, from all accounts, was both willing and anxious to descend from the Nation's highest court to become trustee in bankruptcy for the Republican Party. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

This candidate of the Republican Party, emerging from the cloister as if by magic, looks about him for an issue. Neither the character, dimensions, nor quality of the issue is material. Having said nothing for more than six years, he can with equal facility assume originality of opinion on any subject that appears to give hope of a basis for opposition to the President. Seeing the great constructive program of remedial legislation and executive reform touching our internal affairs brought about by the Democratic Party and its administration, Hughes rises in his political aeroplane to look afar in quest of an issue. To our south he sees Mexico. Poor Mexico! Rent with internal strife, half starved, weak, mostly ignorant, trying to assume the form and substance of popular government, an object of commiseration! But he sees it. Then turning his glance across the waste of waters he sees Europe. He sees it in blood and tears, with murder and superstition walking hand in hand over the graves of their victims, with scarcely a voice to whisper hope to man. And then he sees our ambassadors, and he does not like them because they are Democrats. He sees that our President, his President, the President of all the people has invoked every honorable method in the wide realm of diplomacy to keep from plunging this fair and happy land into the vortex of bloody death and carnage, and he sees how well and how honorably that President has succeeded. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Descending again to give report of his observations, he calls for Crane, of the Old Guard; he sends for Fall, the Concessionaire of senatorial proportions. He also sends for O'Shaughnessy and for Henry Lane Wilson, the discredited and discreditable ex-ambassador to Mexico. What a pity Huerta was not still alive, so he might have called him into consultation. But in default of this he, on motion of these others, consents to become administrator of his estate de bonis non. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Thus commissioned, he has entered upon a campaign of cheap abuse, a tirade of invective, a petty and partisan exhibition of littleness unworthy of a candidate for the high office which he seeks. Neither in his speech of acceptance nor in those he is now making has he given expression to an affirmative declaration, except "I accept the nomination, and I am 100 per cent a candidate." While he condemns the course of President Wilson, he offers nothing in its place. While he condemns him for not protecting the lives or property of Americans along the border, he also criticizes him for sending the National Guard to the border to afford that protection. While he condemns him for not recognizing Huerta, he will not say whether he would have recognized him if he had been President. He condemns him for sending troops to Vera Cruz and condemns him for bringing them away. He condemns him for taking action of any character and then condemns him because he did not take it sooner. And then, as if by way of climax, he condemns himself by admitting that he does not know what he would have done if he had been President instead of Mr. Wilson.

But no true American can be deluded by the efforts of Mr. Hughes and his party to hide their own lack of real issues and the record they have made in Congress by making a pretense of excitement over Mexico. The Mexican trouble is not a new trouble. For 60 years there has been in some form a "Mexican question." Mexico has something more than 15,000,000 people. More than 12,000,000 can neither read nor write, and most of these are denied the right of property. We need not attempt to defend the acts of cruelty, of rapine, and savagery which have accompanied their efforts to establish a government in which the common people are recognized. But we can not think of the ignorant and hungry children, the homeless peons, without a feeling of pity. And when we reflect that many of the wrongs suffered by these people are due to the arrogance and greed of those who have been Mexico's exploiters, we can not restrain our indignation.

It has been the office of America to be a friendly neighbor of Mexico. Hughes says we ought to act as a next friend to Mexico. "We shall have to adopt a new policy," says the Republican candidate, without giving us the faintest conception or suspicion of what it ought to be. He describes that unhappy Republic as "Mexico prostrate, impoverished, famine stricken, and overwhelmed with woe," as if she could point an accusing finger at President Wilson as the author of her woes.

It is but natural that in a country torn by strife, seeking to establish a government in which the people would have some voice, there would be destruction of property and loss of life. It was so in our Revolutionary War, when we were seeking our independence. It was so in our Civil War, when we were torn by bitterness, by hatred, and when both property and lives were sacrificed beyond estimation of value. And so, in the revolutions that have resulted from despotism, from greed, and from absentee landownership in Mexico, there has been much loss of property and destruction of lives. Unfortunately, American lives have been lost, and property owned by Americans has been damaged. But these things have not simply happened since Mr. Wilson came into office. Mr. Hughes would have the American people believe that Wilson alone has been the only President who was ever harassed by the Mexican problem. But those who will take the pains to investigate history will ascertain that every President for nearly half a century has had this problem to deal with in some form.

Sixty years ago, in Franklin Pierce's administration, the American Minister to Mexico was proclaiming that nothing but "the manifestation of the power of the United States" could bring about punishment for the "wrongs" done by the Mexicans to citizens of America. During the administration of President Buchanan the American Minister "broke off diplomatic relations with the Miramon Government" because of ill-treatment by Mexicans of American citizens. Later the Juarez Government assumed authority, and in April, 1861, while Mr. Lincoln was President, his Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, sent the following instructions to Mr. Tom Corwin, Minister to Mexico:

> Information has been received that President Juarez has overthrown his adversaries and established his Government at the capital, and that he has been chosen President at an election lately held, but there are other rumors to the effect that his Government is unable to maintain order; that robberies are frequent on the high roads; and that even a member of the American legation had been murdered on his way from the City of Mexico to Vera Cruz.
> The President would, therefore, use all proper influence to favor the restoration of order and authority in Mexico, and, so far as might be in his power, prevent any incursions or any other form of aggression by citizens of the United States against Mexico.

The Mexican Government had recently complained of an apprehended attempt to invade the State of Sonora by citizens of the United States.

In 1871, President Grant appointed a commission to investigate matters between the United States and Mexico, and that commission found that 60,000 American cattle, valued at $1,000,000, had been stolen; and that a certain Mexican general had gotten rich by robbing American ranches, and that agents of the Mexican Government had shared in the loot. Yet Grant did not intervene nor go to war with Mexico, nor did Lincoln before him, nor Pierce before that.

During the earlier years of Porfirio Diaz, relations with the United States had been strained. In Mr. Diaz's early Government a request was made by the United States to permit troops to cross the border in pursuit of marauders and bandits, which request was refused, although this Government had granted a similar privilege to the Mexican Government. Mr. Hubert Bancroft, in his History of the Mexican People, said:

> The outcry raised in Texas led to instructions being given Gen. Ord to cross the Rio Grande, and war appeared imminent.

How strangely similar that sounds to the conditions which so recently existed in that distressed and unhappy country.

And so the story goes, from one administration to another, and yet they do not intervene or go to war with Mexico. During the administration of President Taft a revolution overthrew the Diaz government and placed Madero at the head of the government. During that revolution and during Mr. Taft's term more than 50 Americans were killed in Mexico and much property was destroyed. But Mr. Taft did not intervene nor did he go to war. In February, 1913, Madero, the President, and Saurez, the Vice President, were murdered in the City of Mexico at the hands of the traitor Huerta and his fellow conspirators, and he wired to President Taft, "I have overthrown the government," demanded recognition, and was backed up in that demand by his friend the American ambassador, Henry Lane Wilson, who wired to this Government before Huerta's hands had ceased to drip with Madero's blood. But Taft refused to recognize him; and on the 4th of March President Wilson was inaugurated President of the United States, inheriting from his predecessor this Mexican situation.

I can not, Mr. Speaker, discuss in detail the steps which have been taken by President Wilson in his efforts to aid Mexico to get on her feet and establish a stable government. But he has been the friend of Mexico and not her enemy. He has thus far consistently adopted the policy which was given approval under the administration of President Taft in a report to the Secretary of State, Mr. Knox, in which this language was used:

> So far no one with any adequate understanding of the situation believes that we should have intervened in Mexico or that we should intervene now. There will probably never come a time to intervene if we exercise the forbearance toward them that we should desire for ourselves.
> But however that may be, it is clear that the time to intervene will be when we can save more American lives by going into Mexico than by staying out of Mexico.

I believe this quotation from a report made to the State Department expresses the feeling of the American people to-day. The American people do not want war, either with Mexico or with any other country. There may be some who have large investments in Mexico who would like to see intervention and conquest. There may be some who would be willing that their ranches be enriched or their profits enhanced by the blood of American boys. But go with me to the fields, to the firesides of this land, where dwell the fathers and mothers whose boys must fight the battles. Let them answer whether they want war. Let them answer whether they are willing to sacrifice the hopeful youth of this Nation upon the altar of property or for any other unnecessary purpose. They know the traditions of our history. They know when our liberty, our rights, our honor, are involved or at stake we would rise as one man to defend them. They know that we are as brave and as chivalrous as in days of glorious battle for liberty and freedom. But they know that war plants no fields, builds no schoolhouses, educates no children, endows no colleges or universities, gathers no harvests; and they know that it is the duty of this Nation to exhaust every means known to the ingenuity of statesmen to preserve and cultivate honorable peace with our sister nations. And especially do they know that this should be our course with weak, distracted, pitiful Mexico, struggling for freedom, for education, for the right to educate her children and live under the roofs of their own homes.

President Wilson has preserved our peace, has kept us from the vortex of war, and has maintained the honor of our flag. Not only has he done this in Mexico, but in the great war now raging across the waters, which for a time threatened to engulf all the world in its horrors, by his firmness, his patience, his great diplomacy, he has brought us safely into port. [Applause on the Democratic side.] These things do not seem to please the Republican candidate for President, for he criticizes the President, and says their contemplation causes him the deepest "shame and humiliation." But he has not yet told us what he would have done under the same conditions. He has not told us whether he would have recognized the murderer, Huerta. He has not told us whether he is in favor of intervention or war in Mexico. He has not told us whether he would have settled the controversy over the sinking of the Lusitania by peaceful methods, or whether he would have gone to war with Germany. He has not told us, he will not tell us, whether he would have adopted the methods of diplomacy or resorted to war in asserting our rights as a neutral nation under international law. And while he loudly proclaims that he is in favor of "firmly and unflinchingly" asserting every American right on land and sea alike, and asserts the universally recognized principle that American rights do not cease at the water's edge, he has not told us, and he will not tell us, whether he approves or condemns the 102 Republicans in the House of Representatives who voted to surrender American rights upon the high seas, rights which have the sanction of international law and were never questioned until the outbreak of the European war.

He stated in his speech of acceptance, and reiterates the statement in his subsequent speeches, that the foreign policy of President Wilson has been "weak and vacillating"; that our prestige and power are gone, and that the only thing that will revive these faded attributes is to elect him President of the United States. But, Mr. Speaker, these empty statements of a candidate for office will not overcome the testimony of the nations of the world. In France, in Italy, in England, in Austria, in Germany, in Belgium, in all the nations of both Hemispheres, President Wilson has given new meaning to the term "Americanism," and he is recognized as the foremost leader of democracy in the world. He has won greater victories in peace than all the monarchs of Europe have been able to snatch from the fire of battle; and when calm is again restored to the turbulent world, when the cannon is spiked, and the soldier returns to the quiet reflection of hearth and field and shop, the name of Woodrow Wilson will be acclaimed the greatest figure that emerged unscathed from the crucible through which the world is passing.

In the effort of Mr. Hughes to make our country appear contemptible in the eyes of the world he slanders our ambassadors abroad who represent the Stars and Stripes in the capitals of the world. It seems inconceivable that even a Republican candidate, and especially one who was so late a justice of the Nation's highest court, could stoop to the cheapness of such hypocrisy. Was there ever a time in our history when we have been more ably or more honorably represented in foreign capitals? With all of Europe at war, and with our ambassadors representing not only the United States but all the belligerent nations now at war, was there ever a more brilliant chapter recorded in behalf of American diplomacy? Did the Republicans ever send a representative who reflected more credit upon his country than Penfield in Austria, or Thomas Nelson Page in Italy, or Morgenthau in Turkey, or Page in London, or James W. Gerard in Berlin? The work of these men has received the universal and unstinted praise of all Americans except Charles E. Hughes, who while trying to instill into the minds of foreign nations a contempt for these brilliant and successful diplomats draws close about his heaving bosom the manly form of Henry Lane Wilson. He pretends to believe that experienced and useful ministers and ambassadors ought not to be displaced to meet the demands of partisan politics. But will he retain Brand Whitlock in Belgium, where he has won the love and respect of people of every nationality? Will he retain Mr. Gerard at Berlin, where he has been so signally successful in handling our relations with the German Government? But it is useless to ask these questions of him. He will not answer before the election, and after the election there will be no need for answer, because the American people will not be misled, they will not be deceived by one whose only claim to public support is an abnormal faculty for misrepresentation and pure buncombe, without the compensating quality of constructive intelligence. For not only do the American people recognize the great service that has been rendered to America and to the world by our ambassadors in Europe, but they recognize that under the "weak and vacillating" foreign policy of President Wilson, and through the ministers and ambassadors he has sent to represent us, all the nations of the Western Hemisphere have been brought into closer understanding and more sympathetic cooperation. President Wilson has done more to reestablish the United States in the confidence and esteem of the Republics of South America than all the Republican administrations that have been in power for 40 years. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This alone will in the years to come compensate for all the slander and abuse which Candidate Hughes will hurl at him from now until the election.

And so the record stands. And what if there be calumny? What if there be misrepresentation? What if there be deliberate and unworthy falsity of statement? It has ever been so with those who serve mankind.

When Washington was commander of the ragged soldiers of the Revolution, risking loss of life and fortune for the cause of American freedom, a combination was formed in Congress to supplant if not disgrace him, and the Pennsylvania Legislature passed and addressed a resolution to Congress condemning him. But they failed of their infamous purpose.

After he became President, he became the object of the grossest slander and misrepresentation ever heaped upon the head of a great Nation. He was accused of deceiving and debauching the American Nation, and after summing up a long string of similar accusations a newspaper of the period asked the following questions:

> What will posterity say of the man who has done this thing? Will it not say that the mask of political hypocrisy has been worn by Cæsar, by Cromwell, and by Washington alike?

When Thomas Jefferson was President of the United States no abuse was too vile, no epithet too scurrilous, no criticism was too unjust to be thrown into his face by his political enemies. He was accused of atheism, of fraud, and of robbery. He was even charged with being "weak and vacillating," and with having swindled his creditors by paying them in worthless currency. What mattered it to them that he was President of the new Republic? What mattered it to them that he was the author of the statute of religious liberty in Virigina? What mattered it to them that he had given to the world the immortal Declaration of Independence? They were his foes, and they sought to discredit him.

When Gen. Andrew Jackson was in the prime of his great popularity as a soldier and as President he was the object of some of the bitterest attacks ever heaped upon an American statesman. He was charged with having suspended the executive, legislative, and judicial functions with military sway; with having insulted the Executive of the Nation, and with having spurned and transcended his orders. He was charged with having usurped the power of the State, and with breaking every law known to nations and promulgating a new code of his own, conceived in madness or folly and written in blood. He was charged with executive usurpation and domination over Congress and the judiciary. They were his enemies. They sought to discredit him.

And there was Lincoln! Sad-faced, patient Lincoln! Was any man ever so misunderstood, so vilified, so abused and criticized? Even in his own party, even in his own Cabinet, he was ridiculed, sneered at, geered and mocked. He was called the "baboon at the other end of the Avenue." He was referred to as the "idiot in the White House." By some he was called a usurper, a traitor, and a tyrant; and by others he was described as "weak and vacillating," and his administration was described by "leading Republicans" as being "imbecile and vacillating, and just weak enough to waste its men and means to provoke the enemy, but not strong enough to conquer." They spoke of his "treachery," and of his having sacrificed the "honor and dignity" of the Nation. It is no wonder that in an hour of despondency he cried out against his fate, and wished that he had never been born.

But where are the traducers of Washington? Where are those who maligned Jefferson? Where are the defamers of the character of "Old Hickory" Jackson? Where are those who, with leering look and sinister smile and tongue that blistered as they lashed, sought to bedaub Lincoln's escutcheon with the infamy of imputed wrong? They lie in unmarked and unhallowed graves. They have all descended into the stillness of a deep oblivion from which they shall not arise. But the figure of Washington grows more imposing as the years go by, and each year pilgrims by the thousand tread softly near his tomb. Jefferson's memory and his deeds are enshrined in the hearts of a grateful posterity. The heroic courage of Jackson as a soldier and statesman inspires each new generation of American patriots. And the tragic career of Abraham Lincoln gives hope to every struggling boy in this fair land, and in his honor we build monuments and cities. [Applause.]

Democracy to-day is led by one whose character and services history will accord a place by the side of these; and as they were vindicated by the overwhelming voice of a grateful people, let me indulge the confident prediction that an overwhelming vindication and indorsement on the 7th day of next November will be recorded by an equally grateful people in behalf of him who at this hour guides with strong and steady arm our ship of state, in whom are combined the foresight of Washington, the wisdom of Jefferson, the courage of Jackson, and the infinite patience of Lincoln. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, at the request of another Member I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at a different place by having printed in the RECORD the letter of Mr. Bainbridge Colby, of New York, declaring himself for President Wilson for reelection in 1916.

Mr. MADDEN. Why should that be printed in the RECORD? What difference does it make whether he declares for Wilson or not?

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire it to be printed; others have been printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from Bainbridge Colby. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. MUDD, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of H. R. 22184, H. R. 20336, H. R. 17779, Sixty-second Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Tuesday, August 22, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

Doc. No. 1329); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CARAWAY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5788) to create two additional associate justices of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1123), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

THE "BLOODY SHIRT" AND SECTIONALISM.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, we have inherited from our predecessors a custom in the Senate which is very convenient, but which to an outsider is very silly and causes much waste of time. It permits Senators who obtain the floor to address themselves to any subject and speak on any question they like regardless of the bill under consideration. Availing myself of that practice I shall not touch on the unfinished business now pending, for I think I have an equally important matter to present.

Mr. President, I will leave for my home this evening, and in taking leave of the Senate, a few days in advance of its adjournment—after having, I trust, performed the best service to my country of which I am capable—I would feel that I had still left something undone, some part of my duty unfulfilled, if I did not express my sorrow and my great surprise at what appears to be a deliberate effort to raise in our present national campaign an issue which I had hoped and believed was long since dead.

But please understand me and believe me when I say that I refer to it at this time and in this place in no partisan spirit and for no partisan purpose, for if that were my motive I would be guilty of the very thing I feel called upon to condemn.

It must have surprised and shocked you, Senators, as it has shocked most of our common country, to find that more than 51 years after Appomattox, when all the great chieftains of our fratricidal struggle have passed over to the other side—where there is no North, no South, no East, no West, but only the glory of God everywhere—that a candidate for the high office of President of these re-United States should have thought it necessary, or even permissible, to drag forth that old blood-and-mud-bespattered banner of sectionalism, the "bloody shirt," and wave it over the heads of the present generation of Americans.

Yet, as surely as we live, we have seen the presidential candidate of one of our great parties do this thing; the burden of his complaint being that a majority of the leaders of the other party hail from the southern section of this great country. Of course, if this be true as to Congress, he knows, and you and I know, that for the most part they have attained to their present rank by reason of long service, or seniority, just as I have done. Some of our distinguished colleagues on the other side of the Chamber, from the East and West, will fall heir to similar positions should the political scales be turned next November.

But that aspect of the situation does not so much matter, nor does any of it matter so much as the mere suggestion that in this day and time there can be drawn in this country of ours a geographical line beyond which men may not aspire to high place in our National Government, or that one political party is less to be trusted than another because a majority of its leaders hail from any section of our country; that the South is a Nazareth from which no good thing can come.

If this be true, my countrymen, then our great Civil War was fought in vain, for it did not reunite, but only served to further separate us. All our heroes have died in vain.

But who will say it is true in the face of all that we have seen these 10, 20, 30 years past; that we are still seeing to-day everywhere about us?

I say I had hoped and believed that "sectionalism" was long since dead—even as a means to an end in political battle—for when some 18 years ago I heard your lamented McKinley—I will say our lamented McKinley—say, "Let's care for Confederate graves as our own, for we were but brothers after all," I said, "Surely the war is over."

And when I saw another Republican President, broad of mind and liberal of heart, elevate to the Chief Justiceship an ex-Confederate soldier, a Catholic, and a Democrat, I said, "Surely this is one country, with one flag and one God."

Then when I saw chosen as President a man born and educated in the South, of a Scotch mother and Ohio father, but elected from New Jersey, I said, "Surely we have come forth from the 'melting pot' a new race of people, and a stronger race than ever the sun shone upon. We know neither North nor South nor East nor West, but only that a good American is a good American, no matter whence he comes or where he goes."

And if this be not the America of to-day, then it is not the America for which Adams, of Massachusetts, planned and Washington, of Virginia, fought.

It is not the America that is symbolized by Bunker Hill or Valley Forge or Yorktown or Cowpens or Kings Mountain, in my own beloved Carolina.

If during the last 20 years I have done aught in this Chamber or elsewhere to keep alive the smoldering fires of sectionalism, let me say to-day that they have long since died out of my own heart and in the land from whence I come. I had no such purpose, but only to defend the South when unjustly attacked and to justify its actions under conditions which you men can never realize imposed by the reconstruction acts. There is a very small remnant among us who still treasure up the memories and hatreds of the war.

I did not earn the nickname of "Pitchfork" on account of my partisanship. It was due to the bluntness and frankness with which I spoke. One year, at the most two, sufficed to make all the Republicans in the Senate know that while radical and uncompromising, my word could be relied on always, and many of the warmest friends I have had as a Senator have been the Republicans whom I have known here. My mother taught me to despise hypocrisy and lying above all else, and I owe this personal characteristic to her. If I ever did hate the northern people—and I confessed to that the last time I spoke here—that hatred and partisanship has died out of my heart; and the pitchfork, if it was considered the emblem of it, has long since been buried. From its grave an olive tree has grown, and I am tendering the olive branch, claiming to represent the South in doing so, to all northern people.

Let me, if I may, before taking leave, to meet you again by the mercy of God, in December, hold it out to you, and through all of you, to the constituencies which you represent, in the earnest hope that it may silence this unjustifiable and unseemly cry of "sectionalism," even as it once heralded the receding waters of the deluge.

I read in the newspapers a day or two ago of a "one-man parade" up Pennsylvania Avenue; a lone Union veteran, unheralded and alone, marching in celebration of his own enlistment in the Civil War. While I accord full credit to him for the patriotism that prompted him to respond to the colors then, and can understand and excuse the vanity even of such an expression of it to-day, I could not but be reminded of that other lone figure that has gone parading and spouting about the country—a veteran of neither side in any way—waving the banner of "sectionalism" before the people who are trying to forget, if indeed they have not already forgotten.

But, in contrast with this "one-man parade," I foresaw another parade that is to take place on Pennsylvania Avenue next spring; when at the invitation of the Grand Army of the Republic the Grand Army of the Confederacy, that was, shall march shoulder to shoulder, no longer foes, but friends and fellow citizens of a reunited country. I ask you, Senators and fellow countrymen, if we may not in spirit, at least, march with them to the greater glory of God and our loved country!

Speaking more for the section of our common country from which I come, let me prophesy that should time ever be when an invading foe seeks to set foot on our country's soil, the same fort that fired the first shot in our great Civil War will blaze forth again in defense of the flag. Or rather, I should say, this would its neighboring fort do—Moultrie—which won the first victory in the Revolutionary War when it drove off Sir Peter Parker's fleet; for Sumter—like sectionalism—is long since obsolete.

In this presence, only a few day ago, I took occasion to say—and I have no desire to retract or qualify it—that I had come to believe that the great war, which that first shot at Sumter ushered in, but did not instigate, ended in the way that was best for all concerned.

In saying this, however, I waived nothing of the principle and patriotism which prompted our fathers to fight your fathers; nor would I detract one iota from the great principles and patriotism that prompted your fathers to fight our fathers. I only say that we of the present day, even we who had some glimpse of the bitterness of those days, now happily gone—in the light of new conditions, and guided by new ambitions and new hopes for our common country—we, as the sons of those patriotic fathers, and heirs to all that they and their fathers before them created for us and our children and grandchildren who are to come after us, may find comfort and glory in the thought that ours is a reunited, strong, buoyant Nation; standing shoulder to shoulder and hand in hand, looking forward, not backward—prepared for any emergency.

The country belongs to us all, and we all belong to it. The men of the North, South, East, and West carved it out of the wilderness and made it great among the nations of the earth. Let us share it with each other, then, and serve it, giving to it the best that is in us, of brain and brawn and heart.

COMPENSATION OF INJURED EMPLOYEES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15316) to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the unfinished business this morning is the bill to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties. This bill, which has passed the other House, is practically the same bill which was introduced into the Senate by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

Mr. OVERMAN. Is it practically the same bill which was reported from the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; it, I think, is a better bill than the one which was before the Judiciary Committee; a more comprehensive bill; a more carefully constructed bill, and a bill that will meet with more general approbation.

We amended the bill which was first introduced into the Senate, which was considered by the Judiciary Committee, in a number of respects before we approved it and reported it. The bill had already passed the other House. The simpler way of reaching the subject is to consider the House bill.

This bill has received a great deal of thought and cooperation in its preparation from the philanthropic organization in New York City, which has devoted so much time to the study of compensation bills, and which has aided in the preparation of bills for probably two-thirds of the States.

As we know, our present statute, which was passed in 1908, provides compensation in the shape of one year's salary to employees. This bill is constructed upon the theory that if permanent, complete disability follows, the compensation shall be two-thirds of the salary, the salary to be estimated at not exceeding $100 per month. Upon the same line, but, of course, not so large in the case of death, the compensation goes to the widow and the children, with about the provisions for a single child or for more than one child that are found in most compensation bills, perhaps a little more liberal than most of the State statutes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator has examined this matter very carefully, and I will ask him if, in his judgment, the bill now before the Senate is a better bill than the bill introduced by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and reported by that Senator and now on the calendar?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the pending bill is one to which more careful and mature thought has been given, and I think probably the organization in New York to which I have referred and which, as I understand, embraces in its membership a number of able and splendid people who have devoted themselves for a long time to the study of State bills on this subject, has contributed a good deal more to this bill than to the other; and, reading it carefully, it has impressed me as being almost perfect, if we limit the payments to an estimated salary of $100. I have favored a larger sum.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if, in comparing the bills, which I have not had time to do, the allowances under the bill now before the Senate are a little more liberal than in the so-called Sutherland bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Except in one regard. We amended the bill in the Judiciary Committee so as to extend the limit as to salary to $150, and we allowed a proportion of a salary of $150 if the salary went that high. The pending bill limits the salary to $100. I have myself always been inclined to find it difficult to understand why we should accept any limitation upon the salary in arriving at a basis for payment on account of injuries received. Of course, the argument is that the purpose of this bill is to furnish a means by which a person could live conservatively and frugally.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, after all, there is not any substantial or fundamental difference between the two bills, is there?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think there is any fundamental difference. I think this bill is more complete, but it involves exactly the same principle.

The Senate committee has reported an amendment, for which I am responsible, and to which I concede there is a good deal of opposition. I know it presents a difficulty, but I believe very thoroughly in it. The amendment adopted by the Senate committee provides that where the negligence of the employee contributes in whole or in part to the cause of the injury, the commission in charge may lessen the amount of compensation to be given proportionate to the injury, provided that in no case shall it lessen it more than 25 per cent. I am aware of the difficulties about this suggestion. The subject of compensation to injured employees is one which has had a great deal of attention from me for a number of years past. I think we are drifting in our philanthropic purpose to serve humanity into the danger of a failure entirely to recognize the differences between men. In our public schools our greatest trouble is that we mass the pupils and give little chance for the brighter to advance more rapidly. We are moving them all up to some extent, but we are checking some too much. I think the danger lies in disregarding the opportunities of men. I know the intense feeling against the use of so-called efficiency systems in connection with Government work, whereby the amount of work each man does is carefully watched and his compensation based upon it. There is a humanitarian side to this view, but there is also a dangerous side to it. We must not stop recognizing the difference in quality of the individual men in this country. We ought to be careful to give to the man who works harder and who has developed faster from his application the chance to rise faster.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. WARREN. Noting the reduction sought to be made where the sufferer has contributed to the injury by carelessness, does the Senator believe that that offer that he has made is going to make men more careful?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. WARREN. Or is it a mere matter of saving of money, or is it both?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have more in view, saying to them: "Your Government recognizes somewhat the difference between the careful and the careless." I object to the compensation bill undertaking to say that the careless man shall have exactly the same amount that the careful man has; but I was illustrating my thought by what I was saying about our general tendencies in all directions. I have the utmost sympathy for every humanitarian purpose to serve the weak. I have the greatest sympathy for the injured, even though they are negligent; but I do believe that one of the dangers of our legislation in favor of social justice to-day is that we are almost entirely omitting to impress upon the people the difference between the man who will make the full effort and the man who will not. There ought to be some stimulus and some reward always held out for the vigilant and the careful. While I would treat with the utmost kindness the unfortunate, no matter from what cause, the real object I have in desiring this amendment is simply to emphasize the proposition that we do make some distinction. I would not care how little it was. I am not after the amount; I am not after punishing anybody; but I can not accept as sound the doctrine that the altogether careless should be treated just as the altogether careful.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator knows that there are some States that for years have had the standard of comparative negligence in determining liability. There are some States which have adopted the rule that any contributory negligence bars a recovery. Does the Senator think that there are fewer accidents, relatively, in those States which have the comparative rule than in those which have the absolute rule that I have mentioned?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not see why there should be.

Mr. CUMMINS. For this reason: In my State, for instance, any contributory negligence bars recovery—that is, until the passage of the compensation bill—and in Illinois there is the doctrine of comparative negligence. Now, it would seem that under the Senator's reasoning the employees of Iowa ought to be more careful and vigilant than in Illinois, and that there ought to be fewer accidents, therefore, in my State than in Illinois, relatively. I am sure the Senator would not assert that there are fewer accidents in a State that has the absolute rule of contributory negligence than in those States which permit a recovery—a partial recovery, if you please—where both contribute to the injury.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I can not say that my observation is to that effect.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then, it would not work so in this instance, would it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It might; yes. To change from absolute loss of right of recovery due to negligence to entire right of recovery without reference to negligence is a far greater step than to change from absolute loss on account of negligence to comparative loss, as was the rule in Illinois. I believe that if we adopt the doctrine of complete compensation for the entirely negligent with the entirely careful the tendency will be to lessen the stimulus to care.

Mr. CUMMINS. I only suggested the illustration which I named in order to show that it did not stimulate care. The employees of my State were no more careful than the employees of Illinois, although any want of care contributing to the injury in my State defeated all recovery.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And I said, Mr. President, in reply, that there is a much greater step from loss of all recovery on account of negligence to entire recovery without regard to negligence than there is from loss of all recovery on account of negligence to a comparative recovery on account of negligence. In the one case there is partial recovery; in the other case there is no recovery; and in the third case there is complete recovery for the entirely negligent right alongside of the entirely careful.

I do not believe, Mr. President, in announcing the doctrine that a man entirely free from negligence is to be treated exactly in the same way as a man who is entirely negligent and entirely responsible for the injury that comes to him. I do not care how small the difference may be. I am not after taking the money away from him. I dislike to see the national standard announce the doctrine that the two stand exactly upon the same plane. I believe, as I said before, that our general tendency in legislation is not sufficiently to recognize merit, and too much it does away with those things that recognize merit.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia further yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is true, is it not, that this bill has for its chief object the support of dependents when injury comes to the supporter of the family—that is, to the widow if death ensues, to the children or to the family if there is total or partial disability? The penalty which the Senator from Georgia seeks to impose will fall upon the widow and the children or the dependents of the person who suffers the accident. They are not in anywise to blame, and the very thing that we are trying to do will be in part prevented if the amendment of which the Senator is speaking is adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator is mistaken in one respect. The amendment provides that the reduction shall not apply in case of death, but that the compensation to the widow or the children shall be the same.

Mr. CUMMINS. I only used what I said as an illustration. I understand the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I simply mentioned that.

Mr. THOMAS rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just one word further, and then I will yield to the Senator from Colorado. The Senator says that under the other circumstances we take from the dependents. Mr. President, there are dependents on men who make a $200 salary. There are dependents on men who make a $50 salary. One makes four times as much as the other. They are equally dependent; but as the man who makes the $200 has developed greater earning capacity and has more force and effectiveness for accomplishment in him than the man who makes $50, so his dependents turn to a support with four times the resources. Now, the dependents upon a man who is negligent and who negligently brings on his own injury have not the same man to depend upon as have those who depend upon a man of care and a man of watchfulness.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to suggest another reason in support of the position which he is asserting. I have no doubt that it has occurred to the Senator, but it is this: All the statutes with which I am familiar upon this subject make the distinction which the Senator insists should be made here. Of course, those statutes are not applicable to Government employees. Now, is it just or fair that we should establish by statute a distinction which is a preference for the Government employee that does not exist with the man who works for a private employer? Is there any reason why this distinction should exist, and is there any reason why it should be removed from the existing statutes with regard to private employment? It seems to me that it is a fundamental basis for all of these compensation acts.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I certainly think not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, just a moment. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question. I think there may be some misapprehension about it. The Senator from Colorado says that most liability laws recognize the distinction sought to be introduced in this bill, and I believe he is right about that; but he would not say, I think, that most compensation laws passed by the various States recognize these distinctions.

Mr. KERN. Exactly the contrary.

Mr. THOMAS. As far as my recollection goes, Mr. President, they do; and they ought to if they do not. Certainly the employee who is careful and diligent in looking after his own welfare and that of his employer should be distinguished from the negligent and careless individual whose injury is or may be the consequence of his own lack of diligence and care.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUSTING. I want to say to the Senator from Colorado, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me, that I think in most of the States having a compensation act—and I am positive that in Wisconsin, my own State—the compensation does not depend upon negligence or contributory negligence. The only exception is willful negligence, or wanton injury brought about purposely. The principle underlying those laws is that the compensation is not given because of the diligence or denied because of the want of diligence, but is given because it is held and believed that an injury in a certain occupation, whether caused by negligence or without negligence, should be charged to that occupation as an overhead expense that ought to be paid and that this particular occupation or enterprise should sustain.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not as familiar with all the statutes upon the subject as others. As far as my recollection goes, the rule, I think, is as I have stated it. Now, I have always, since 1883, contended for the abolition of the old common-law doctrines of assumed risk and negligence of a fellow employee; but I never have been able to reconcile my notions of justice with the doctrine which places the negligent and the careless and the inconsiderate upon the same plane with the careful and the efficient and the diligent.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. HUGHES. What I intended to say I expected to direct to the Senator from Colorado, who has left the Chamber; and I do not know that it is worth while, because it seems to me the view he holds can hardly be held by any great number of Senators in this body.

The distinction the Senator fails to make appears to me to be this: We are not now pretending to compensate a man for any injury he may receive. We are not compensating him as the ordinary jury would compensate him; neither do the various compensation acts of the various States of the United States. In my State any citizen of the State can waive any benefits he may derive under the act and go into an employment free from the assumed risks which the Senator speaks of, and in case of injury or death he or his representatives can lay the matter before a jury, in which case he would receive infinitely more than he would receive under this act.

This is, as the Senator from Iowa said, a compensation proposition in which the employee waives a great deal of what he might expect to receive, and in which the Government waives a great deal that it might demand even if it were a private employer, and they compromise their differences and agree that these accidents, avoidable or unavoidable—because we all know the weaknesses to which human flesh is heir—shall fall, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, upon the particular industry; and there is to be no hairsplitting and no long and fine drawn out technicality as to whether or not the man has conducted himself as he should have conducted himself at the particular moment when the injury occurred.

I was a common pleas judge of my State when the compensation law was recommended by the governor, the present President of the United States, and enacted by the legislature. It was my duty to administer the law. I can remember one case in which the Erie Railroad, a corporation operating through the public streets of my city, had an employee who, off the railroad property, was struck by an automobile and killed. The railroad company then set up the point that this man was practically not in their employ, but was killed by an outsider. I held that the mere fact that he was an employee of theirs and was killed while he was in their employ entitled him to the benefit of the compensation act. That decision was carried to the highest court of my State and was there sustained. Such a thing, of course, would be unheard of under the ordinary operation of liability laws such as the Senator was referring to.

I think this is a wonderful step that we are taking now; but I must differ with the Senator from Georgia with reference to the amendment that I see proposed in this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I can not accept as sound the doctrine that by legislation you can take away one man's rights who is careful and give them to another man who is careless; and a compensation act which undertakes to force such a doctrine upon men employed in labor is unjust and, in my opinion, indefensible. This bill, however, does not occupy that position. These are employees of the Government. They can not sue the Government; they have no right of action against the Government, and it is a broad effort to provide for them with greater liberality than has been done in the past. I think I can say that it is more liberal than the laws of the States, certainly than any that I have examined. It is more liberal than the law of New Jersey, to which the Senator who has just left the Chamber referred.

Mr. HUGHES. I have not left the Chamber.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He is sitting behind me. I am glad he is still here. It is more liberal than their law.

Mr. President, for many, many years, for a century, an extreme doctrine was held about the nonliability of a master for injury to his servants. The negligence of his servant freed him from liability. The extreme and, I think, inexcusable doctrine also was adhered to in England for quite a length of time, until changed by statute, and in many of the States of the Union, particularly in New Jersey, that master was entirely free from liability for injuries caused by the negligence of a coemployee. I think that doctrine was extreme and almost brutal.

But, Mr. President, when we came to pass a national statute upon the subject of employers' liability in connection with corporations engaged in interstate transportation we did not provide for absolute liability to an injured employee who was negligent; we provided for comparative liability and for a reduction in proportion to his negligence.

We have in the last few years reached a new theory, one of compensation, and I think it is wise and in many respects just, but we are seeking to swing entirely away from all remnants of the recognition of negligence.

I disapprove the old rule. In my own State I succeeded in having it modified by statute years ago. I have been fighting those old rules for 30 years.

But, Mr. President, the danger always is that when we find something of evil and desire to substitute something that is good, the humanitarian spirit that makes the substitute is apt to leave out something that is good in the old law.

What I object to in the extreme compensation theory is that it gives no regard at all to the difference between the status of the careful and the status of the careless. I do not care how small it is; I only ask that the law recognize a man who does his full duty as occupying at least a little different position from the man who is careless. I think we should keep before our people all the time everywhere the inspiration to effort, the inspiration to exertion, the inspiration to development, the inspiration to the highest possible proficiency in whatever line of occupation may be pursued. I think we should seek always to inspire the highest degree of care. It is the development of our people for which we long. Our forefathers established this country; they fought for our liberties; they gave us our Constitution that we might here have an opportunity to develop the greatest, the freest, the best people whom the world has ever known.

Now, let us not do away with all things that inspire effort. Let us not in our purpose to alleviate evil forget that if our standard of manhood is to continue to grow, if the character of excellence of our people is daily and yearly to be better and higher, we must keep before them the thought of individual responsibility and individual effort.

I believe in this amendment. I do not care for the percentage. I do not care if you cut it to not more than 10 per cent. I just want to say that we recognize somewhat the difference between care and negligence.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I assume the Senator's amendment is a very liberal departure from the old doctrine of contributory negligence.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, yes, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. But it recognizes the fact that negligence ought to be taken into account to some extent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is all I ask; only they can not reduce it over 25 per cent. They are not obliged to reduce it that much, but in proportion to the negligence.

Mr. GALLINGER. It strikes me that the principle involved in the amendment is a very sound one. I agree with the Senator that care should have more consideration than negligence on the part of employees everywhere.

Mr. KERN rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is just one other amendment that I wanted to bring to the attention of the Senate. I will be through in a moment.

The only other amendment to which I desire to direct attention is one which I will offer transferring the force now connected with this work in the Department of Labor to this commission.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that I can not support the amendment of the committee. The Senator from Georgia seems to have confused in his mind employers' liability laws and compensation laws. Compensation laws have been enacted in 32 States of the Union. Full compensation laws have been enacted in some 22 or 25 States of the Union. In none of them which are now in force is the question of contributory negligence taken into account. These statutes that have been placed upon the statute books have been the result of great study and research on this question. The subject has received the profound thought of the best economic thinkers in the country, and it is the universal consensus of opinion that while the doctrine of comparative negligence or contributory negligence ought to have a place in the employers' liability law yet in compensation laws they are entitled to no place at all.

A compensation bill, and a very good one, was introduced by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. That bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and after a very thorough investigation a report was made which deals with the very question under discussion. Senator SUTHERLAND in his bill made no exception as to contributory negligence cases, and in discussing that feature of the bill the Senate Judiciary Committee makes the following comment, which with the permission of the Senate I will read:

> In the English law "serious and willful misconduct of the employee" precludes compensation; in British Columbia "the serious and willful misconduct or serious neglect" excludes compensation; Denmark and Finland "intentional or gross negligence"; in France intentional injuries are excluded and in case of inexcusable fault on the part of the employer or employee, the compensation is increased or decreased; in New Zealand "serious and willful misconduct" excludes; in Russia "intentional or gross imprudence." On the other hand, in Austria, Belgium, Greece, Hungary (unless fatal), Norway, and other countries compensation is refused only in the case of "intentional" injuries.

I might add here, Mr. President, that every country in the world save Turkey has enacted liberal compensation laws, and in the countries that I have named the employee is not denied compensation on account of contributory negligence.

Now, let us get at the reasoning of the committee. The proposition is stated very clearly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will yield to me a moment, that is the reasoning of Senator SUTHERLAND, not of the committee. He made the report for the committee. I served on the subcommittee with him, and he and I prepared the bill. He reported it. I never suggested this amendment before the committee. It is the reasoning of Senator SUTHERLAND, who alone is responsible for that report.

Mr. KERN. It is very excellent reasoning, no matter from whom it has come.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not questioning that. I just did not wish as a member of the Judiciary Committee to be considered to be a party to the reasoning.

Mr. KERN. This report was made by Senator SUTHERLAND on behalf of the Judiciary Committee, and there was no dissent, either from the report itself or from the conclusions stated by him. It will interest the lawyers of the body to know that this reasoning comes from so able and careful a lawyer as the junior Senator from Utah:

> Various laws which in any way recognize the element of negligence or misconduct as precluding or affecting compensation have led to much litigation in order to arrive at their scope and meaning. The objection to all such limiting provisions is that the law is deprived of one of its chief virtues, namely, the element of certainty. Of course, such provisions will have the effect of sometimes preventing the payment of compensation where in strict justice it ought not to be paid, but that is more than offset by relieving the administration of the law of the element of uncertainty, the presence of which would bring hardship and injustice upon a much larger number of employees. Every lawyer understands how difficult it is in modern industry to determine whether given conduct is negligent. What appears as such is sometimes only the selection, often necessarily hasty selection, of one of two methods of doing a piece of work, when upon a cool survey of the entire situation afterwards it is seen that the other method would have been safer. So-called negligence is frequently so affected by other circumstances, particularly in modern complicated industry, that it sometimes becomes exceedingly difficult to determine whether the negligence or some other circumstance was the controlling cause of the accident. Perhaps one-half of the accidents occurring under the present complex industrial conditions is the result of fortuitous circumstances for which nobody is to blame. Under these circumstances modern compensation laws are more and more rejecting the element of negligence altogether, and are basing their compensation upon the fact of injury and not of fault.

Now, the Senator from Georgia has offered another amendment, and I may consider the two together. The other amendment provides that instead of the questions growing out of this law being referred to a commission organized for that purpose they shall be determined by a division of the Department of Labor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator is mistaken. I have not offered any such amendment to the bill. It is that the force now engaged under the act of 1908 in the Department of Labor handling the present pay be transferred to the commission and be their employees entirely independent of the Department of Labor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, just a moment. The Sutherland bill, the report upon which is now in the hands of the Senator from Indiana, provides that the law shall be administered by the Secretary of Labor. I intend before the consideration is finished to offer an amendment to the House bill restoring the administration of the law to the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from Indiana will pardon me one moment, on the contrary, I most cordially agree with the view of the bill that it can be best administered by this independent commission.

Mr. KERN. I am glad to know that I was mistaken in my statement as to the effect of the Senator's proposed amendment. But, however, the law is to be administered whether by a commission or whether by a division of the Department of Labor, the proposed amendment will introduce into the administration of the law a constant source of annoyance and interference. As stated in the report from which I have just read, the question as to what is contributory negligence and what is not contributory negligence comes up in a thousand different ways. It is a matter of constant dispute. Under the old system one-half the time of counsel in damage cases was occupied in discussing the question as to what was contributory and what was not contributory negligence. Pages and almost volumes of court decisions have been occupied in a discussion of the legal question as to whether or not certain actions on the part of the employees would constitute contributory negligence. Now, it is proposed to inject into this law that kind of an element of uncertainty which will from the very start involve the commission, if it be a commission, or the division of the bureau of the Department of Labor, if it should be given the administration of the law, in all the perplexities and worries that grow out of an investigation into each particular case as to whether or not certain actions on the part of the applicant constitute contributory negligence.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, would the Senator from Indiana venture upon an estimate of the number of injuries that will occur under the bill during a year, as informed by the past.

Mr. KERN. I have no idea. The present law on the subject, which is a sort of makeshift law, applies to about one-fourth of the Government employees. The proposed law will apply to something over 400,000 persons in the employ of the Government. I imagine that of 400,000 persons entitled to the benefits of the law a very large volume of business would come before the commission, or whatever body may be charged with its administration.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have busied myself a little with an estimate upon that question. In my opinion five courts sitting continuously 300 days in a year would not be able to determine the questions of contributory or comparative negligence. Every injury practically would result in a long difficult trial in order to reach a conclusion with respect to the conduct of the injured employee whether he had in any way contributed to the injury which he had suffered.

If the Senator from Georgia will look over even the law we now have and consider its operation, he will at once be convinced that we would have to have courts enough or commissions enough to try two, three, four, or five thousand cases a year.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, as I have already suggested, it removes the certainty, which is one of the chief beauties, if I may use that word, of this kind of legislation, and it restores uncertainty where there ought to be certainty. It will interfere very largely, I believe, with the administration of the law.

The arguments made by the Senator this morning, while they would apply with full force in a discussion of the enactment of proposed employers' liability laws, certainly can not be regarded as of great weight in a discussion of this measure, especially with those who have studied the history of the legislation and the economic aspects of the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to ask another question of the Senator from Indiana, if he will yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Has the Senator observed the difference in another respect between the House bill and the Senate bill—I mean the bill that was reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate?

Mr. KERN. Oh, yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is pertinent, because the Senator has read from the laws of various countries the standards which have been established in the bill considered by the Judiciary Committee as it came from a subcommittee, of which our friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] was a member. The only exceptions made were, first, if the injury was brought about by the willful intention of the person injured; that is, the words are, "Where it is proved that the injury or death of such employee is occasioned by his willful intention to bring about the injury or death of himself or of another"; second, that it "resulted from his intoxication." Those are the only two exceptions in the Senate bill. The House bill brings in another; and even if it were not amended in any way, it is still illiberal enough to the employee. It says:

> But no compensation shall be paid—

I am quoting from the House bill.

> But no compensation shall be paid if the injury or death is caused by the willful misconduct of the employee or by the employee's intention to bring about the injury or death of himself or of another, or if intoxication of the injured employee is the proximate cause of the injury or death.

We have therefore introduced into the bill, without the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, an additional exception, namely, an injury the result of willful misconduct. That is a very different thing from a willful intention to bring about the injury. It will be hard enough upon the employee if he is compelled to prove that the injury was not the result of his willful misconduct, without putting upon him the further burden of proving that his negligence did not contribute to the injury. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Indiana had noticed that difference in the two bills.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I think the rights of the Government are amply protected without the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. Therefore I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I agree fully with the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] in his conclusion that this amendment would simply provoke a great deal of unnecessary litigation, would consume a tremendous amount of time, would cause great expense to the Government; and, in my judgment, more, indeed, than we would save to the Government by reducing the amount 25 per cent from that to which the bill as it stands entitles an injured employee.

I am particularly glad, Mr. President, that a bill of this character is to be passed by the Congress. I have long been interested in attempted legislation of this general character in my State, where for the past 12 or 15 years, at least, I have endeavored to do away with the old law of master and servant, which we still have in all its vigor and with all its horrors. The assumption of risk, negligence of a fellow servant, contributory negligence have been the means of practically placing upon the weakest portion of our community—in many cases the widows and orphans of men who have been killed while doing their duty as workmen as well as they could—the great burdens, the sorrows, and the distress which certainly in a measure should have been shared by the business in which they were engaged, and, in cases like this, by the Government for which they worked. Therefore it is with a great deal of pleasure that I shall give my vote for this bill.

I shall also vote to remove from the bill the amendment which proposes to inquire in each case whether the injury was due to contributory negligence, and that will be the inquiry in each case, and a multitude of special agents and a very great number of lawyers would necessarily be engaged in ascertaining the facts.

Mr. President, I have but a word more to say in regard to this matter. I have said that my own people in Delaware are still laboring under the horrors of the old laws applicable to the relation of master and servant. I desire to pay a tribute to the judges of my State, however, by saying that they have endeavored in every way possible to modify these laws in the interest of suffering humanity, by applying wherever possible and extending as far as possible the doctrine of proximate cause; but I welcome every effort that is made anywhere in this country to produce a sentiment which will grow and spread until nowhere in this country will either branch of the legislative body in any State refuse to listen to proper appeals for the modification of the old law which at this time and in this year of our Lord, in my judgment, simply works hardship, unfairness, and dreadful results to the social relations of the working people of this country.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I also wish to state that I oppose the amendment reported by the Senate committee, and I oppose it on several grounds. For one thing, I think the principle of the amendment is entirely repugnant to the real national purpose in this bill, and I believe it is unwise as a general policy for another thing. I believe that the purpose, which I fully and heartily indorse, is to put the employees of the United States in the same position as the employees of industrial concerns generally. The purpose of this bill, as I understand, is to do away with the harsh rules applied to individuals who are injured in the course of their occupation, and, in addition to that, to do away with the harsh rule which exempts the United States, in the absence of any statute, from any claim whatsoever on account of personal injury suffered by its employees.

The employees of the Government who are going to be benefited by this bill when it shall become a law, I presume will be largely engaged in industrial activities, in the service of the United States in navy yards, and in factories of various kinds where injuries are likely to occur. In framing a bill with that in mind, it seems to me that we should take into consideration not only the experience of industrial concerns generally and the experience of those engaged in industrial pursuits, but we should also take into consideration the experience and interests and purposes of the people generally. We should consider why we are going to enact the law, what we are attempting to remedy, and what the remedy shall be.

As I understand it, the reason that compensation laws have been enacted in the various States—and I come from a State which enacted, I believe, one of the first ones, and a good one—is to relieve the workers of the country from the harsh rule of the common law. In the first place, under the common law, when a workmen was injured at his occupation, the entire loss and burden fell upon him and his family. The man himself may have been a careful individual, a diligent workman, who for years pursued his activities without injury, but who in a thoughtless moment suffered an injury, perhaps suffered death; whereupon the loss fell upon that individual or his family, as the case may be, instead of falling upon the community generally, and particularly on the industry in which he was engaged. That is a very harsh rule to apply to any man who gives his life in a pursuit which conduces to the benefit of society.

Again, the rule of contributory negligence was applied, under which, when an employee was injured, if he was guilty of any want of ordinary care, he could not recover, and the loss and damage fell upon him and his family. Not only that, but it fell upon him and his family, even though his employer was guilty of negligence and he was only guilty of contributory negligence; so that the employer entirely escaped any liability if, perchance, coincident with his own negligence, there occurred contributory negligence on the part of the employee.

Furthermore, by virtue of the fact that every injury that occurred raised a question of negligence, it became necessary for the injured party to go into court to get his claim paid; in other words, every accident that occurred held within it a potential lawsuit. So poor men, men working by the day, were obliged to employ lawyers, to secure money in some way to get witnesses, and to go into court and litigate their rights against powerful corporations, which have a great deal more means, of course, than the ordinary individual had, and many of which made a business of contesting claims that were made against them, thus placing their employees under a tremendous disadvantage.

Not only that, but by virtue of the very poverty of the claimant he could only procure counsel by agreeing to divide up with that counsel the fruits of the litigation. So he had to find lawyers who were willing to take a chance and who would go into court in the hope of getting a large proportion of the amount in case of recovery. So it came about that when men were injured a large proportion of them never sued, a large proportion sued but never recovered, and a very small proportion sued and did recover; and when they did recover they lost from a third to a half or even a greater percentage of the amount that was justly due them because of their injuries in the payment of their witnesses' and attorneys' fees. As a consequence the net results to the injured person were reduced to a minimum, and he rarely got anything near what he was entitled to by reason of the injuries that he suffered. So it seems that the feeling grew all over the country that this was a very unscientific and unsatisfactory way for employers to protect men in their employment and to see that they were compensated for injuries which they received in the course of their employment.

So a new idea grew up—and that, I think, is what these compensation laws are based upon—that when manufacturers employ men to manufacture certain articles not only the cost of labor and the cost of material should enter into the cost of the article manufactured, but the injuries suffered by the men in that employment should be reckoned as a necessary and inevitable element of the cost. Now, in the case of any man who engages in the manufacturing business, when a machine breaks down, or when some accident occurs in his factory other than that in connection with his employees, that loss was always charged up to the industry. It was an overhead expense. For instance, if horses were employed in a manufacturing industry and one of them was killed, that horse was charged up as an item of expense of operation in that industry. If cars or engines are used and accidents occur and property is destroyed, that was charged up as an item of expense and added to the cost of manufacture. And so we finally got to the idea that human beings employed in an industry, who shed their blood, sacrifice their limbs or their lives in that employment—and these things are inevitable in a manufacturing establishment—should be compensated and that such compensation be charged up as an expense of that business and added to the cost of manufacture, charged up to the finished product, and be borne by the community at large.

That is the theory that I think underlies compensation laws generally. Consequently the negligence of a man does not enter into the equation at all. It is entirely repugnant to the idea of compensation laws, in my judgment, or at least is entirely irrelevant to the main question. It is merely a question of carrying out the principle and the theory that compensation of men who are injured or destroyed in a manufacturing business should be considered as a part of the cost of the business in which they are engaged, and that that cost should be charged up to the finished product to be paid by the people at large who purchase the product.

Now, men will be careless. No large manufacturing establishment that I know of runs for any length of time but that inevitably at some time, somehow, some man loses his life or his limb. Consequently the expense incurred by reason of loss of life or limb can be forecast with reasonable certainty in every manufacturing establishment of any size or consequence.

Therefore it is my judgment that it is wrong in principle, wrong in theory, and will prove to be wrong in practice to withhold compensation from any individual because he has been momentarily careless. It does not enter into the equation at all. It is not a question of who was at fault, but it is a question of whether this expense shall be borne by the injured individual and his family or whether you are going to charge it up as an overhead expense against the industry.

That should be all the more true when a man is working for the United States, although as far as this act is concerned I presume we must regard the United States purely as an employer. But as an employer having hundreds of thousands of men working for it, and one which should show a good example to our citizens, whatever loss of life or injuries may be occasioned to employees of the United States in the course of their employment—in their work for the people of the country—along manufacturing or other lines should be charged upon the whole country, and the country should stand for it just the same as individual industries are standing for it.

Under the theory of the amendment suggested by the Senate committee, we hark back to an idea that should be eliminated from a true and fair workmen's compensation act. We depart from the idea of compensating a man and his family for losses suffered in the ordinary course of his employment, and we go back to find out whether he could not have avoided it instead of going to the question of compensating him for injuries suffered.

The experience in my State—Wisconsin—under our workman's compensation act, has shown that accidents have been reduced by a very large percentage in Wisconsin, which certainly negatives the argument made by the Senator from Georgia that if workmen are going to be penalized or have their compensation reduced they will be more careful.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not say that.

Mr. HUSTING. I thought that was the effect of the Senator's argument.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What I said was that I rejected the idea that no discrimination should exist between the careful and the careless; that the tendency of our humanitarian legislation was unfortunate in that respect.

Mr. HUSTING. I took it that the Senator from Georgia argued that there would be a tendency to reduce the number of accidents if men were to receive less compensation when they were injured as a result of carelessness than if they were injured through no fault of their own. I want to say right here, in regard to that, that men who are injured in their employment are injured because they can not help it. The particular individual who is injured can not help it. According to his knowledge, according to his habits, he is doing the best he can. I do not suppose there is one man in ten thousand or one man in a hundred thousand who is injured because he wants to be injured or because he is indifferent to injury and suffering. He is sufficiently punished by nature by suffering the pain naturally incident to a severe accident. He does not want to be injured, and he does not purpose to be injured. His injury and the injury of every man, except one in a hundred thousand or perhaps one in a million, is to him an inevitable accident, something that is bound to occur, something that has to be reckoned with in any industrial institution in the country, no matter how careful employees may try to be. So long as men are human, men will be careless. So long as men are not perfect, men will suffer lapses in caring for themselves. We all know that accidents will happen and do happen.

It is going to happen just as surely as the sun rises in the East and sets in the West. So many men are going to be injured under given conditions, and their loss or damage should be properly charged up to the cost of the finished product and not rest upon individuals or their families.

Of course, it is entirely proper, and I agree with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], that a man who willfully subjects himself to an injury, who willfully sacrifices an arm or sacrifices a leg, ought not to be taken into consideration. That is something that no one can reasonably expect, foresee, or control—that a man would willfully injure himself. But as to a man who merely is guilty of what is called contributory negligence, I say that he should not be penalized, no discrimination should be made against him in favor of his more fortunate and more careful brother in case he, not because of any law on the books, but only because nature has made him so, suffers an injury where a man more carefully constituted, more careful in his make-up, does not suffer an injury.

What is the result of these compensation laws? If it is true that fewer men will be injured if careless men do not receive as much compensation as careful men, then in States having these compensation acts more accidents should occur! But what has been the result? The result in my State has been that the law has made the employer more careful. He insures in an insurance company. The insurance company send around their inspectors to inspect these manufacturing establishments. Labor-saving devices are installed, and as a result the accidents in the industries of Wisconsin have been reduced by a remarkable percentage, not because the men have become any different, but because the employers, knowing, or rather appreciating, that when a man is injured they have got to pay an increase in insurance, that their insurance rates will be increased, have installed labor-saving devices, and have hedged about their employees every protection in order to lessen accidents and thus be able to enjoy more favorable rates of insurance. I want to go further and say that by reason of the law in Wisconsin our employers have become interested in the question of lessening injuries in their factories, and so, for humanitarian reasons as well as that of an enlightened self-interest, they are preserving the lives and health and efficiency of their employees as well as compensating the unfortunate ones.

That is the way it has worked out in Wisconsin. Only a short time ago I read a report on the showing that this law was working out, in the State in which I live, in the most satisfactory manner, and that the manufacturers themselves would not go back to the old system if they could have their own way about it. The employers are entirely satisfied and the employees are entirely satisfied.

It is true that the employee who is injured, or the family of an employee who is killed, does not get the same damages that would be obtained from a jury; but I think it is safe to say that it is working out in this way—that in the net result, eliminating the lawsuits and eliminating the attorneys and the go-betweens, he and his family are netting, for each injury, a better percentage than they would in a personal-injury suit. They are getting more for injuries suffered, a larger percentage, than they ever got under the old barbarous system in vogue theretofore. Not only that, but nearly 100 per cent of the injured are now receiving compensation as a matter of course, where formerly only a small percentage ever received one cent and suffered the loss occasioned from his injuries.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] says that it would not make any difference to him how small the percentage was, the deduction should be because of the employee's negligence. No matter how small the deduction, what I object to in this bill, Mr. President, is that the principle interjected is going to defeat the beneficial purposes of the bill to a very great extent. Suppose a man is injured, and assume—and I do not think it is a very violent assumption—that you are going to have some inspectors go and look up these matters and see whether that man was injured through his own negligence or not, it means that every case will have to be inspected, to start with. Now, of course there will have to be attorneys on the part of the Government to examine into these claims and present them to the commission. That will be inevitable; and while this bill authorizes the commission to sit in various parts of the country, yet it means delay, it means expense, and, above all, it means a lawsuit, because it will be the duty of the commission to sit in judgment on every case, and every case will have to stand on its merits, and the amount of compensation to be paid in each instance will depend upon the facts in each particular case. Each injury is a case by itself, and the result will be that an injured employee, instead of being compensated in the regular course of business, will find himself up against a mountain of troubles to get what is coming to him. He will be up against a hard and expensive practice if the commission does its full duty and investigates each case—not whether a given person is entitled to this extra 25 per cent or not, because I believe that there is only a very small percentage of the accidents that occur where the question of negligence will not be open to question and to litigation and adjudication.

So it will cost the Government a lot of money to make this very inquiry; but, worse than that, it will cause every man who is injured, against whom a charge will be made of contributory negligence, to have a lawsuit on his hands. He will have to subpœna his witnesses, he will have to employ counsel, and he will have to go before this board, and you will have a court instead of a commission, and they will have to try out each case just the same as it is tried out in the circuit courts, only 25 per cent is at issue instead of 100 per cent; and if you reduce that to 10 per cent you will still not eliminate the difficulty. You will have to litigate the 10 per cent, and the lower you go the less reason there will be, but not the less necessity for it, because the injured employee will have to present his case in order to get the compensation to which he is entitled; and when you do that you are heading right straight back into the old system which involves the question of contributory negligence.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that if the United States wants to take care of its employees the same as other industrial institutions or other concerns are taking care of their employees, as the Senator from Iowa said, you must eliminate the uncertainty, so that the only question of fact that should be at issue would be, Was the man engaged in this employment? Was he injured? How much should he receive for that injury? If the negligence question is left for adjudication, if anything of that kind is left for controversy, I say it means a lawsuit, and it means great expense to the Government.

But more than that; it means expense to the injured party or his family, and in the end it means that the money paid by the United States is frittered away in litigation, and does not reach those who are justly entitled to all of it, and is no compensation to amount to anything.

It seems to me that there is not sufficient reason—in fact, there is no reason, in my judgment; no good reason, if the Senator will pardon me for saying so—why that should be in the bill; but there is every reason to the contrary if the Government wants to deal justly with its employees and to keep pace with the legislation in the States upon this subject. It seems it has been the policy of most of the States on this very point, which is the point of the greatest controversy—I know it was in my State—not to put in the question of negligence at all. The right to compensation should rest upon the broad principle I stated at the outset, that when a man is working and is injured in the ordinary course of his employment, and is injured not by any willful act on his part which shows that he wanted to be injured, that injury should not be borne by him or his family alone, but should be charged up as an overhead expense in the operation of the plant, whether it is a national or an industrial plant. It should be charged up to the people who enjoy the fruits of his labor, and he should be compensated, to the end that he may not become a public charge upon the community, but that he may receive a quid pro quo for his services and for the injuries that he has received in the ordinary course of his employment. He and his family should be compensated upon broad humanitarian grounds and because it is founded upon right and justice.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is to be hoped, in the interest of those for whom this bill is to be passed, that the amendment proposed by the Senate committee will not be adopted. In my judgment, it would be practically useless if in every instance there must be tried out before some tribunal the question of negligence.

I hope the Senators upon this side of the Chamber will recall that the bill introduced by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], a student of this subject and an eminent lawyer, did not admit negligence into the equation. I hope they will remember that the bill was carefully considered by a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, of which my friend, the Senator from Georgia, was a member, that it was reported by the subcommittee unanimously to the full committee without any such provision as is now suggested, that it was considered by the full committee and reported to the Senate unanimously without any such provision, and is now on the Senate Calendar for action by the Senate.

I may be permitted here to say that while there may be a difference of opinion with regard to the subject we are now discussing and a difference of opinion with regard to the merit of the House bill as compared with the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee, in my opinion the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee is a better bill, everything considered, than the bill which came from the House. I have made, from time to time, the suggestion that when the bill was under consideration I would offer the Senate Judiciary Committee bill as a substitute. I do not intend to do it. So earnestly am I in favor of the bill itself and of the principle which is involved in it that I am willing to accept the House standard of compensation and the House provision with regard to the payment for injuries. I shall offer an amendment that will substitute the Secretary of Labor for the commission that is sought to be established in the House bill. However, that is not before us at this time.

I have mentioned the action of the Judiciary Committee upon the subject in order to assure those who have not given the subject great study that it was the opinion of members of the Judiciary Committee that compensation should be paid for injuries sustained by Government employees without regard to negligence which may have contributed to the injury, subject only to two exceptions—first, a willful intention on the part of the injured person to bring about the injury, and, second, a state of intoxication which helped to bring about the injury.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. May I inquire of the Senator whether those provisions have been incorporated in the House bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. Both of them are in the House bill, with one additional exception, namely, willful misconduct. I am very sorry it is there. I do not believe it ought to be there, because the inquiry as to what is willful misconduct is a difficult one. It is almost as difficult as the inquiry as to contributory negligence, and it ought to be eliminated from the bill. The two exceptions, in my judgment—and I believe that is the consensus of opinion throughout the country—are sufficient.

Mr. President, I agree entirely with the view taken by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING]. It is in harmony with the suggestion I made a few moments ago in an inquiry put to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. I asked him his estimate of the number of injuries that would occur during the course of a year among the 400,000 civil employees of the Government covered by the bill. He did not, of course, attempt to answer; but allow me to say that there are 100,000 civil employees of the Government now covered by an inadequate and imperfect law which gives certain compensation in case of injury, and, as I remember, the annual injuries suffered among the hundred thousand employees aggregate between four and five thousand.

We now propose in this bill, and wisely too, to add 300,000 civil employees to the number for whose injuries compensation shall be paid. I quite agree that the 300,000 we are about to add will not increase proportionately the number of injured, because these employees are engaged in occupations that are not so hazardous as the occupations of the 100,000 now within the scope of the law; but it is obvious that if any considerable addition is made to the number of injured and if in one-half the injuries the inquiry shall arise, Was the injured person guilty of contributory negligence, and if so to what degree? no commission of three men could make those inquiries. I understated it when I said it would require the continuous service of five independent courts. I think it would require more, if we would be compelled to enter upon a regular trial such as we have all observed in personal-injury cases to determine every circumstance connected with the accident or the injury to determine who was responsible for it and in what degree each of the persons who contributed to it was responsible or guilty. I need but mention the number of cases that would inevitably come before such a tribunal, or series of tribunals, and appeal to the knowledge of all lawyers who are familiar with the course of personal-injury trials in order to convince them that the proposal is one which is impracticable even if it were just. But it is not just. If the Government of the United States was suable, and I will assume for the moment that it is, because in fairness it ought to be, we are substituting for the liability of an employer to an employee a compensation which is so much less than the rule of liability would afford or give the employee that in justice we must give the employee some advantage that he would not have under the rigorous rule of the common law.

In my State we have an optional compensation law. I am not one of them, but some lawyers believe that a compensation law in order to be constitutional must be optional. I think that was substantially the decision of the court of errors and appeals of New York in rather a famous case. But in my State the option is influenced to some extent by a provision of the law which withdraws from the employer certain defenses which he could otherwise present, and we make that an inducement for the employer to agree to come in under the workmen's compensation act.

Mr. President, I spent 25 years in the courthouse, most of the time, and I suppose I have tried during that time as many personal-injury cases as anyone in the western country. It was my observation and is now my reflective judgment that in 75 per cent of the cases in which injury results from negligence the person injured is in some degree responsible for the injury; that is, it rarely happens that an accident is brought about solely by the carelessness or negligence of a single person. Ordinarily the accident is caused by the coordination of the negligence of two or more persons. It only happens once in a long while—I am speaking of those cases in which some one is negligent—it only happens once in a long while that the employee by the exercise of care, if he were conscious and thinking of the subject at the immediate time, could not avoid the injury.

I mention this because in its application to this measure, if this amendment is adopted, it will in my judment result in a reduction of 25 per cent of the compensation allowed in 90 per cent of all the cases to which it applies. We might just as well adopt the hard and fast rule of a 25 per cent reduction as to empower or attempt to empower the commission to administer the law of contributory negligence, because the commission would not only be required to ascertain whether there was any negligence upon the part of the person injured, but it would be required to go further and compare the degree of that negligence with the degree of the negligence upon the other side.

Now, have any of you ever attempted to compare the negligence of two persons whose joint carelessness contributed to an accident? It is an utterly impossible thing. It can not be done in the majority of instances. Once in a while we reach a case in which the negligence on the one side is so gross that the negligence upon the part of the injured man or woman is slight in comparison; but anyone who has gone through from day to day and year to year with the trial of such cases knows that in the vast majority of them there is no way of comparing the degree of negligence.

We have adopted that rule in the liability act. Many States have adopted that rule; but generally the application of the rule is given to a jury, and the jury determines the degrees of negligence and reduces the recovery accordingly. The jury has no rule; there is no review; it is a sort of equitable independent tribunal that administers justice according to its own light, and there is not much trouble about a jury giving to an injured person the sum of money that in its opinion fairly compensates him for the suffering or disability that may have been occasioned; but I should like to know how a commission supposed to be made up of men with cultured, trained, educated, disciplined minds can compare degrees of negligence. It has not the freedom and the irresponsibility which attaches to the verdict of a jury. In my opinion the effect of this law would be simply to impose a reduction of 25 per cent in every case to which the amendment is applicable and in which the commission would find that there was any degree of contributory negligence.

For these reasons, Mr. President, although recognizing the strength and force of the broad argument made by the Senator from Georgia, I am opposed to the amendment. He can not outrun me in the desire to build up individual strength of character; he can not excel me in the insistence that the safety of the country depends upon the initiative of the individual and his power to care for himself and lift himself above the common level and to accomplish great things; but I must say that his strong and persuasive argument is without value when applied to a compensation law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall consume the time of the Senate upon the part of the argument which insisted that on principle there should be no difference in a compensation act between the negligent and the careful only to say it is so evidently unsound, so utterly indefensible, it needs only to be submitted from any source to destroy itself.

There is, however, a part of the argument to which I concede there is strength. I refer to the difficulty of the administration. If I thought for a moment that this rule would apply to 90 per cent of the employees, I would be as much against it as any Senator; if I thought the commission would seek to enforce it in any such a way, I would be against it.

I want to say in behalf of the committee that while the amendment comes from the committee it is only candid to admit that the majority of the committee were not disposed to be in favor of the amendment, but they yielded to my views and agreed to it.

Now, with reference to the enforcement of such an amendment, I do not expect it to be enforced at all in the way the Senator from Iowa suggests. I would not expect any considerable number to have their recovery reduced 25 per cent. I would only expect in the most flagrant cases of negligence, when there was apparent and transparent responsibility for the accident resting on the party injured, that the 25 per cent reduction would be made. I would expect that perhaps in 10 per cent of the accidents there would be a reduction ranging from a nominal reduction of 5 per cent to a very small number of reductions of 25 per cent. I would not expect any trial.

If I thought there would be trials with lawyers I would not be in favor of it. In view of the fact that we have a commission of three men, not required to take testimony to reach a conclusion, with the broadest latitude, with the broadest discretion, I would expect them simply to adopt a rule with regard to their inspectors, when it was apparent that there was negligence and substantial negligence, to let them have the information, to talk with the parties injured perhaps and take their statements in a spirit of kindness, and in the spirit of the bill to make some slight reduction, limited absolutely, never to go above 25 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. A little while ago I ventured to suggest that I thought the principle involved in the amendment was a sound one, but upon reconsideration I want to ask the Senator a further question about it. Whether it be the Secretary of Labor or a commission created according to the terms of the bill, that official or that commission will be in the city of Washington, I presume?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The commission under the bill have the right also to travel and visit different places.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, they would not do that to investigate some trifling accident.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no.

Mr. GALLINGER. An accident occurs in San Francisco or in Seattle or in New Hampshire, it may be. Who takes cognizance of it? Who raises the question as to negligence? The United States district attorney?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all. There would be no presumption of negligence. The representative of the commission would have to report on the accident from Government employees, and unless there was some suggestion by superior officers of substantial negligence I would not expect the question to be raised at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator speaks of the representative of the commission. Who would that be? Would they station men at different parts——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not think so. I do not know how they conduct their work now. I have not looked into that. There is a force of men who handle this subject now. The superior officers representing the Government in charge of work would make reports, and they would act upon the reports of the superior officers in most instances, coupled with statements from the men.

Mr. GALLINGER. That has troubled me as I followed the discussion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And I want to admit to the Senator from New Hampshire that the argument of the Senator from Iowa as to the difficulty of enforcement troubles me. I do not deny that. I insist that the principle is right, but that there is trouble about its enforcement.

I am ready to take a vote. I doubt whether anyone except myself will vote for the amendment. I have stated to the Senate that it should not be considered as the matured view of the committee, because I think the majority of the committee were averse to it, but I insisted so strongly upon the principle that they consented for me to make the report. I want to be perfectly candid about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator asked a question which I think ought to be answered. I will address this inquiry to the Senator from Georgia. Section 15 provides:

> SEC. 15. That every employee injured in the performance of his duty, or some one on his behalf, shall, within 48 hours after the injury, give written notice thereof to the immediate superior of the employee. Such notice shall be given by delivering it personally or by depositing it properly stamped and addressed in the mail.

The superior transmits it through the regular channels of the service and finally to the commission provided for. Then the commission, if it desires to do it, has the right to send an examiner and ascertain the circumstances of the injury.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I take it for granted that unless the original report indicated some special case of negligence the inquiry as to negligence would not be pursued at all.

I want to say with reference to the bill that came from the Judiciary Committee, that while I was on the subcommittee I did not suggest this addition in that bill, because I hardly thought that the Department of Labor was organized in a way to pass upon it. I felt with confidence that the commission in charge of this special work would direct it in a way to do no hardship to anyone and in a spirit of kindness rather than parsimony. The commission is required to pass on each case to grade the degree of injury, and passing upon negligence would not be more difficult.

I do not desire to prolong the debate on this subject. I accept as a fact, Mr. President, the view that the majority of the Senate do not approve this amendment, and without withdrawing it I am willing to have a viva voce vote and dispose of it and go on with something else in another part of the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am glad to hear the Senator take that position. I am in entire accord with the view expressed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that with this amendment in the bill it would be utterly impossible for the commission to administer the law. If we will just pause and think that in a city of 400,000 people, with their multifarious interests, we require a number of judges of courts—probably four, five, or six judges of original jurisdiction—to take care of the litigation in that community, we can very readily come to the conclusion that where we have 400,000 people, with all the injuries which they may fall heir to in their varied employments, it would not only take one commission, but it would take several commissions to be able to adjudicate upon the injuries which those people might receive.

And bear this in mind, please: By this amendment Congress would not be reducing the length of time which would be consumed in adjudicating these matters. The limitation is as to the amount of reduction to be made in the amount to be paid to the injured employee. You can only reduce it 25 per cent; but in order to determine what ought to be done with respect to that 25 per cent it is going to take as much time and just as much skill to distinguish between the proximate cause and the remote cause as if a hundred per cent were involved.

But, more than that, I suggest this: It seems to me that the amendment itself offends against the principle which is involved in a compensation act. All of us who have been practicing lawyers have observed the amount of time that is taken in trying personal-injury cases. We have witnessed wise judges sit on the bench and announce to the jury certain general fundamental principles of law, defining the rights and obligations of the plaintiff and of the defendant; but when it comes to a determination by the jury of the particular facts involved in each case, they have a difficult task before them. Sometimes they go wrong and sometimes they go right.

I remember hearing one judge speaking of his experience in the trial of a case against a railroad company, in which he said that he had tried the case three times; three verdicts had been rendered against the corporation, and three times he was compelled to set aside the verdicts because they were against the weight of the evidence. Another lawyer present at the time suggested with much force that it did not seem to have occurred to the eminent judge that it was possible that he might be wrong and that 36 jurors who passed upon that case might be right.

It is because we have been confronted by just such situations as this that the sentiment in favor of workmen's compensation acts has been growing all over the country. But more than all this we ought to bear in mind that the public is interested in having its unfortunate people who meet with accidents properly cared for.

In my own State we have a most liberal compensation act; and while it was fought for a time by the employers of labor, I am satisfied that if they now had their choice they would not go back to the old system.

It is shocking to one's sense of justice to think that, except for a few special acts to which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] referred, under the United States Government we have 400,000 employees, the most of them without any right of action against the Government at all in case of injury. It seems to me that the Government itself ought to be one of the good employers of the country, and that it ought to take care of the men who have suffered injury while in its employment.

Mr. President, we must bear in mind that whether the man who has been injured partly through his own fault or not, if he is injured to the point that he is not able to take care of himself, and does not have friends who are able to care for him, he is a public charge, and the public ought to adopt some proper means for his care.

When it comes to the Government taking care of its property, if anything happens to it, the Government sustains the loss and must bear it, except as it is protected by insurance. Here are 400,000 men, each one of them a cog in the governmental machinery, and yet up to date, except in rare instances, when these men have been injured, they have had no recourse as against the Government.

It does seem to me that the amendment which has been presented by the committee ought to be rejected, and that we ought not any longer to recognize the fact that as between employers and employees there is such a thing as contributory negligence or proximate or remote cause of the injury or the rule of negligence of fellow servants or the doctrine of comparative negligence as it existed, at least, some years ago in Illinois, but let us care for those who may be injured under some general compensation law such as that which is now before us without regard to whether they were guilty of some negligence or not. Let us remember that they are our brothers and are worthy of our care and consideration. Men are the best asset of the Nation and they should be provided for accordingly when they meet with misfortune.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, inasmuch as the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has expressed himself as not being very violently in favor of this amendment, I do not propose to take up the time of the Senate with any very extended remarks. I merely want to reply to something which the Senator said in regard to the principle here at issue in the bill.

The Senator from Georgia is a very distinguished lawyer, and still he says it is absurd to say that this proposed amendment offends the principle of the compensation act. I want to say, in reply, that I would hesitate somewhat to put my own judgment against that of the Senator from Georgia but for the fact that in the great number of States in which laws similar to this have been enacted, the Senator would find himself in a very small minority. Those States have all accepted the principle that negligence has no place in a workmen's compensation statute and is repugnant in principle to the purpose and scope of the bill. The personal-injury action or right-to-recover rate is one that sounds in tort; it is an action ex delicto. The workmen's compensation act is an act ex contractu. The basic principle of this law, which entitles an injured person to compensation, does not primarily depend upon his want of negligence or carefulness; it depends upon his employment. He is entitled to recover if the fact of his employment and the fact of his injury are established. The Senate committee, therefore, has injected the question of negligence, not for the purpose of defeating the right to recover; therefore it can be put in as a measure of damages only. Well, that can not furnish any fair measure of damages, for the simple reason that it measures nothing. If a man injured in his employment under a workmen's compensation act is entitled to recover by virtue of his employment and by virtue of having suffered an injury in that employment, the fact that he was negligent or not negligent does not enter into the question of how much he ought to get; it does not measure his damages. The question of damages is measured in this bill, as I understand it, by the extent of his injury; whether it is partial, whether it is total, and what his pay has been. A man who has been guilty of a slight want of ordinary care is injured just as much by reason of that lack of ordinary care and is entitled to recover just as much as though he were not guilty of that slight want of ordinary care.

Not only that, but under this proposed act any negligence whatever reduces the measure of the damages that he is entitled to recover under the act. I want to say in reply that it appears to me absurd to say that when a man is injured, and by virtue of this act is entitled to compensation, any degree of negligence whatever lessens the injury that he received. He is just as badly hurt, his family and himself are just as badly in need of the money that he is to get, as though he were one of the most diligent and careful persons engaged in the employment. So I say that negligence as a measure of damages is not at all helpful; it does not get us anywhere; it does not tell us how much a man ought to get or ought not to get.

I merely want to say in conclusion that this act, as I understand it, is not a question of rewarding or punishing an employee or of punishing an employer. Under the old doctrine of the common law governing personal injuries, the employer was held liable because he was guilty of a tort; he was guilty of a wrong in that he so conducted his business that as a natural and direct consequence of his negligence an employee was injured. But this law of compensation is framed on a much broader and deeper principle than that. As I understand it, it is this: That if a man is injured, not in the commission of any offense but in the ordinary course of his employment, injured, as men will inevitably be injured in every employment, whether he alone shall suffer that injury or whether the community will suffer it for him. In a sense it is a question of insurance. The community guarantees under this bill to a man that is engaged in the ordinary courses of employment—in this instance the Government guarantees him—that if he is injured in the ordinary course of his employment he will be compensated to a certain extent. As I said before, it is not for the purpose of rewarding him, but it is merely for the purpose of taking that burden and distributing it over the whole country and letting the country stand it, which means to all of us an infinitesimal part of the injury, which otherwise would fall upon a citizen of the United States.

This is done as a matter of justice; this is done as a matter of sound public policy—that men injured in the employment of the Government shall not become a public charge. It does not help to say that if a man is injured by being somewhat at fault himself there is less need or less reason for him needing help. The moment we say that we are departing from the principle of the bill. The only question should be, Was the employee injured in the ordinary course of employment; and if so, under the terms of his employment? Then, under the terms of the law he is entitled to the compensation therein provided for, and the question of whether he in part, much or little, contributed to his own injury is not an element in the act at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I am ready to vote on this amendment. I am afraid to again indicate that I do not expect it to carry, because I fear to provoke additional discussion against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to section 30, which reads:

SEC. 30. That the commission shall have such assistants, clerks, and other employees as may be from time to time provided by Congress. They shall be appointed by the commission in the same manner as appointments to the competitive classified civil-service positions.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, before we reach that, I wish to offer an amendment transferring the present force to the commission to be created.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This is an amendment recommended by the members of the committee unanimously. I move to add, immediately after section 28, on page 17, a section, to be known as section 28a, and to read as follows:

SEC. 28a. Upon the organization of the said commission the work of the Department of Labor connected with the adjustment of claims of employees of the United States for injuries shall cease, and all pending investigations and proceedings in the Department of Labor in connection therewith shall be continued by the commission. All clerks and employees now engaged in carrying on said work exclusively in the Department of Labor shall be transferred to and become employees of the commission at their present grades and salaries.

Now, if the Senator from New Hampshire will do so, I should like to have him read his proposed amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, does the Senator want action on the amendment he has just suggested?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should be glad to have the Senator read his proposed amendment for information.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well. I will again read section 30 as it now stands in the bill:

SEC. 30. That the commission shall have such assistants, clerks, and other employees as may be from time to time provided by Congress. They shall be appointed by the commission in the same manner as appointments to the competitive classified civil-service positions.

I do not know what is meant by that language. I do not understand how the commission can appoint clerks and stenographers "in the same manner as appointments to the competitive classified civil-service positions."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it means that the employees will have to come from the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I offer an amendment that will make that very clear; and I hope the Senator will accept it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think I will accept it, so far as I am authorized to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). The Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, section 30, line 5, after the word "appointed," it is proposed to strike out "by the commission in the same manner as appointments to the competitive classified civil-service positions" and to insert "from lists of eligibles to be supplied by the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the civil-service law."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I submit the amendment to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], who presented the bill originally to this Senate. If he has no objection to it, I will raise none.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Georgia if he will not withhold the amendment which he read a moment ago until the amendment which I desire to propose can be acted upon? The transfer of the present work from the Department of Labor to the commission would not be necessary if the amendment I propose to offer is adopted, and, if it is not adopted, no one could then object to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I withdraw the amendment for the present to give an opportunity to the Senator from Iowa to offer his amendment striking out the provision with reference to the commission. I want to say that I am strongly in favor of the commission, and by yielding to the motion of the Senator from Iowa I do not in any sense mean to indicate that I favor it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this is a fundamental amendment, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Hughes	Owen	Smith, Md.
Borah	Husting	Penrose	Sterling
Brady	James	Phelan	Stone
Bryan	Jones	Pittman	Taggart
Chilton	Kern	Pomerene	Thomas
Clapp	Lane	Ransdell	Thompson
Cummins	Lea, Tenn.	Saulsbury	Tillman
Curtis	Lippitt	Shafroth	Underwood
Dillingham	McCumber	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Fletcher	McLean	Sherman	Warren
Gallinger	Myers	Shields	Williams
Harding	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. KERN. I am requested to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is necessarily absent from the Senate.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

First, strike out the word "commission" from the following lines and pages of the bill, to wit: Line 23, page 2; line 21, page 3; lines 25 and 1, pages 3 and 4; line 8, page 5; line 2, page 7; line 13, page 9; lines 4 and 5, page 10; line 7, page 11; line 11, page 12; line 20, page 12; line 22, page 12; lines 22 and 23, page 12; line 25, page 12; line 1, page 13; line 7, page 13; line 13, page 13; line 20, page 13; line 23, page 13; lines 11 and 12, page 14; line 17, page 14; line 20, page 14; line 24, page 14; line 26, page 14; line 14, page 15; line 18, page 15; line 21, page 15; line 22, page 15; line 22, page 17; line 1, page 18; line 10, page 18; line 11, page 18; line 14, page 18; line 21, page 19; line 24, page 19; line 9, page 20; line 15, page 20.

Also, strike out the words "commission or to any commissioner" in line 19, page 12, and the words "commission or any commissioner," line 21, page 17, and in lieu of the words stricken out in each of the above instances insert the words "Secretary of Labor."

Also, strike out of lines 11 and 12, page 22, the words "commission" and "its" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Secretary of Labor."

Also, strike out section 28.

Also, strike out section 30.

Also, strike out section 34.

Also, strike out lines 6, 7, and 8, page 21, and insert in lieu thereof "The powers conferred and duties imposed herein upon the Secretary of Labor may be exercised or performed by any person or persons employed in the Department of Labor, and who shall be designated in writing by the Secretary."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the amendment just read seems to be somewhat complicated, but in fact it is exceedingly simple. I will assume that the Senate will allow me to present the several items of the amendment as a single amendment, for they all touch the same subject and are all necessary to accomplish a single purpose. If the amendment I have offered is adopted, the law which we are about to pass will be administered by the Secretary of Labor in the Department of Labor. If the amendment is not adopted, it will be administered by a commission of three persons to be appointed by the President, each with a salary of $4,000 per year, with quarters suited to the taste of the members of the commission, and with the retinue of employees, clerks, special agents, and examiners which naturally gather around every commission which we create.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Does this amendment make any change at all in the law except transferring the administration of the law to the Department of Labor?

Mr. CUMMINS. None whatever.

Mr. President, I did intend—I had it originally in mind—to offer the bill which has been reported by the Judiciary Committee as a substitute for this one, and as between that bill and the one under consideration there is some difference in the standard of compensation; but upon reflection I concluded that it would be better to accept the House bill with regard to compensation and ask for no other change in it except that it should be administered by the Secretary of Labor and in his department rather than by an independent commission.

Mr. President, I have offered this amendment in justice to the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate. As I remarked when a former amendment was under consideration, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], a master of this subject, a man who has given it great and prolonged study, introduced a bill which is substantially, so far as compensation is concerned, like the bill afterwards reported and like the bill that came from the House. The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. A subcommittee was appointed, of which the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] was a member, and of which the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] was also a member. That subcommittee examined the bill and investigated the subject and unanimously reported to the full committee in favor of the bill, with certain amendments. The full committee gave the most careful and serious consideration to the bill, and finally reported it unanimously to the Senate, and it is now upon the calendar.

One of the questions discussed among the members of the Judiciary Committee was the very one that I have presented by this amendment: Shall the law be administered in the Department of Labor, or shall we create another commission in order to distribute the compensation which by the bill we award to injured employees of the Government? The Committee on the Judiciary decided that it ought to be administered by the Secretary of Labor, just where the law we now have upon the same subject is administered. The House bill, as I said before, provides for the creation of an independent commission of three members, and the law is to be administered by the commission.

I am in favor of the Senate Judiciary Committee idea, the idea of the Sutherland bill, for two reasons, and I intend to give them very briefly.

First. I am in favor of it because the law can be administered in the Department of Labor for one-tenth the expense that will be involved in the creation of another new commission. I venture to say that under the Department of Labor in the administration of this law there will not be one-tenth the number of employees doing this work that will be found by the commission to be necessary to accomplish it.

It is the history of commissions. We have enough commissions now. No; I will withdraw that. We may have to create more, and we are about to vote to create one more. We are about to vote to create a tariff commission, and I have been in favor of a tariff commission throughout my whole public life, but I do feel that we ought not to create any more commissions than are absolutely necessary. It seems to me that my friends upon the Democratic side of this Chamber ought not to rush unnecessarily into expense that is not required for the dispatch of business.

There is no necessity for a commission for the distribution of the compensation which we are providing here. If the amendment which was proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] relating to contributory negligence had prevailed, the amendment which I have now offered would not have been presented; because, in my opinion, if the commission, or any other tribunal, had to try all these cases in order to determine what negligence had occurred, it would require not only a commission but a complete court, and many of them, to dispose of all the cases that would come before the Government for compensation. That amendment, however, was rejected, and now the only matter to be determined in each case is the extent of the injury.

The bill divides the subject into three classes: First, injuries that result in death; second, injuries that result in total disability; third, injuries that result in partial disabilty. Through the administration of similar laws in the States this subject has been reduced to almost a formula, and it can be done with dispatch and with justice and with economy in the Department of Labor, where it now is, so far as we give compensation at all.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KERN. I will inquire of the Senator from Iowa if he knows of any States in which such a law as this is being administered by an administrative officer?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, in most of the States there is no administrative officer who occupies the relation to the Government that the Department of Labor occupies to the Federal Government. In my own State the law is administered by a single person, and we have a population of 2,500,000.

Mr. KERN. Does not the Senator's State have a commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. We have not; no. There are States, I admit, in which a commission, I think, is necessary—in which certainly the services of more than one person is necessary—like New York and Massachusetts.

Mr. KERN. In nearly all the States there is a commission to administer the law, and I did not know that there was an exception in the case of the State of Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that does not mean anything to me—the fact that they want to put the matter in the hands of commissions in some States. These States which have commissions mainly empower the commission to do very many things that are not authorized in this bill. The commission has, in most instances at any rate, a function to perform really apart from the distribution of compensation; but in the case before us there is no necessity for a commission. It can not do anything except to spend money unnecessarily.

But that is not my main reason. I have another reason that I am almost reluctant to disclose. I desire that this law shall be administered sympathetically. If it is not administered by a man or a board in sympathy with labor, in sympathy with those who have suffered in the course of their employment—I mean men who labor have suffered—very much of the benefit which is expected to be derived from it will be lost. We have organized a Department of Labor, and it may be assumed that the Secretary of Labor, the head of that department, will always be in sympathy with the great mass of the laboring people of the United States. To assist him this bill is proposed; and I would rather intrust the administration of the law to him, through his department, with his association with labor, than to intrust it to an independent commission which will become in a measure hostile just as certainly as time passes on.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I am not at the moment so much concerned about what the Senator has said as to a sympathetic administration of the law as I am about another feature of the discussion. I submit for the judgment of the Senator whether a law like this ought not to be administered impartially, not partially; whether it ought not to be administered with the one central idea of having absolute justice in every case? The establishing of an agency to administer a law, based upon the idea that that agency is to be especially sympathetic with a certain interest, does not occur to me to be a wise theory of legislation. I do not disagree, nor would any other Senator disagree, with my friend from Iowa on the general, broad ground of human sympathy, but I doubt if laws should be passed or administered on the ground of sympathy rather than of justice.

But I do not care to enter further into that now. What I rose especially to ask related to the administration of this law in the Department of Labor.

I am entirely in sympathy—since we speak of sympathy—with what the Senator has said against the multiplication of commissions. We have too many of them already. Some commissions undoubtedly ought to be created; but we have fallen into the habit of making a commission to do every little thing we start in to do here in the Congress, when it might as well be done, and done as efficiently and at less expense, by turning the administration of the law over to an agency already established.

The Senator from Iowa says that the administration of this bill, if it becomes a law, should be left to the Department of Labor. Aside from the sympathetic aspect of the matter to which the Senator has referred, it seems to me there is sound sense in his suggestion. What is the need of this commission? Why must we have a commission of three or four men with large salaries every time we start in to do anything? I believe the salary here provided for is $4,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; $4,000.

Mr. STONE. Then, the salaries of other commissions rise on a graduated scale, presumably according to the importance of the work. Now, it seems to me a $4,000 salary is not going to attract to the service men of extraordinary ability. You will get good men, men of average ability, and that is all.

In some ways what the Senator is saying appeals to me; but I should like to have him tell me just what the agencies now are in the Department of Labor through which this law could be administered. And will it not be necessary, if you strike out the commission clause in the bill, to devise some other or additional means of administration operating under the Secretary of Labor?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is not necessary to organize a bureau in the Department of Labor. As I understand, the Secretary of Labor now designates certain persons in his department to administer the law we have; but I hope the Senator from Missouri will remember that the law we have is a very imperfect and inadequate and rather inconsequential affair as compared with the law we are now about to pass.

Mr. KERN. And I was about to say, ineffectually administered.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know that. I am very glad that the Senator from Missouri agrees with me with regard to the first objection I proposed to the creation of a new commission, and I know that he would agree with me with regard to the second if we understood each other. I do not want it to be thought that when I used the word "sympathetic" I implied that the tribunal was to be partial or unfair or unjust to either side; but I think there is a great distinction between an injustice that results from a conscious hostility to a person and an injustice that arises because of the bent of mind, the tendency of the intellect, the want of sympathy with the class to which the person injured may belong.

Now, I ask the Senator this question: We have organized a Department of Labor. Suppose that a President were so far shameless as to propose a Secretary of that department who was known to be hostile to the great laboring organizations of this country and to the people who were represented in those organizations. Suppose the President of the United States should take the president of the National Association of Manufacturers for that position. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] knows some of the persons belonging to that association and their attitude toward labor. I am not criticizing them. They have a perfect right to hold their opinions; but suppose it were suggested that such a man be made the Secretary of Labor, to preside over this department, which is intended to further, promote, and encourage the cause of labor. There would be universal protest against it. Why? Not because the president of the National Association of Manufacturers is a dishonest man or would administer the law dishonestly or with conscious unfairness, but because, by reason of his position, he would be incapable of viewing the whole ground; and I meant that we ought to put the administration of this law in the hands of men who had a care for labor and a real sympathy for laborers.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I have just been called out for a moment; but before going I should like the Senator to explain, so far as this particular matter he is discussing goes, what would be the difference, in selecting people who are sympathetic or nonsympathetic, whether the appointments related to the secretaryship or the commissionership? The President appoints both, subject to the approval of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. This is the difference—and I want the Senator to wait until I answer that, because it is a pertinent question. The difference lies in this: When the President comes to select a Secretary of Labor he must have in mind a great many things, and no President would venture to select a Secretary of Labor out of sympathy with the cause which that department is supposed to represent or to protect; but when the President comes to appoint the members of a commission to administer a compensation law, having no other duties, the influences would be very different.

Mr. President, I did not intend to occupy the length of time I have occupied in the submission of this amendment. I have done it in fulfillment of a promise to members of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and especially in fulfillment of a promise I made to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], eulogized, and very properly eulogized, this morning by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. This does not mean that I am not in entire accord with and earnestly in favor of the proposed amendment. I am. I believe the law will be better administered, more economically administered, and that the whole country will be better satisfied, if this work remains with the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I have no pride of authorship in this bill, for, although it bears my name, I did not prepare it. It was prepared with great care, and after much thought and consideration, by an association of thinkers and workers in economic and philanthropic fields, associated in New York under the name of the Society for the Promotion of Labor Legislation. It is a patriotic association, made up of the best economic thinkers and workers of the country, who have approached the consideration of the subject from the standpoint of both employer and employee, and, above all, from the standpoint of the public good. This bill was, after great thought, worked out by that great association, brought here, and introduced by me in the Senate and by a Representative from Maine in the House.

I have not been able to give to this subject the careful thought and consideration that was given it by the scholars and thinkers who make up that society. I perhaps could not occupy quite so disinterested a standpoint as the men and the women who compose that society. We are about to pass a great piece of legislation that we hope will be a model of its kind. It affects 400,000 employees of the Government who have been helpless, in all the years of the past, in the redress of their wrongs and compensation for injuries they have received. It has been disgraceful that the great Government of the United States has lagged behind every nation in the world, civilized and half civilized, except Turkey, in the care it has given to the people who are employed by it.

I am caring nothing about the question of commissions or the men who may be appointed on the commission. I am caring very little about the $12,000 that the commission will cost. At a time when we are voting away hundreds of millions of dollars for the implements of destruction, it seems to me that it does not sound well to have men stop and higgle about an appropriation of $12,000 for salaries for a commission that is supposed to be necessary for the successful carrying out of this great piece of legislation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator refer to me as higgling about $12,000?

Mr. KERN. The Senator was talking about the expense of the commission. The expense of the commission is $12,000. I perhaps was unfortunate in the use of the word "higgling." I was simply employing a Hoosier term that came to my mind at the moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Indiana has been very industrious I know about the bill, but he has not done any more for it than I have done.

Mr. KERN. I have no doubt the Senator is in sympathy with the bill and the underlying principle of it. I am not criticizing him in anything that he has said, because I assume that he and I are equally interested and that all the friends of the bill are equally interested in having a successful administration of the measure. If it can be successfully administered by the plans suggested by the Senator I have no objection to it, but I am not convinced that it can be so successfully administered, and the people who have given months and years to the study of this question are not so convinced. The Secretary of Labor is not so convinced. Its friends care to comment on the fact that there are some Senators here, and I do not refer to the Senator from Iowa, who have perhaps not given an anxious consideration to the bill and who stand up and say, "What is the use of a commission?" putting their judgment, after no investigation at all, against the judgment of people who have given the matter such profound thought.

The Senator from Iowa proposes that there shall be no provision for a commission, but that the work of administration shall be devolved upon the Secretary of Labor; in other words, to devolve upon the Secretary of Labor this great piece of legislation which involves the work of 400,000 and say to him, "Enforce it." The Senator from Iowa must know, as we all know, that the Secretary of Labor, with the multifarious duties devolved upon him by law, has no time to even personally oversee the great work of the administration of this law. Somebody else, then, must be called in by him, and who shall he call in? Has he the head of a bureau, has he the head of a division who does not now already have duties to perform that occupy his entire time? The Senator from Iowa by his amendment designates no officer; he confers no power to procure officers, but simply says, "Enforce the law."

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Indiana is mistaken about that. He has not read the amendment. Of course he has had no opportunity to read it.

Mr. KERN. I beg pardon.

Mr. CUMMINS. I say the Senator from Indiana is mistaken in his last statement.

Mr. KERN. I will be very glad to be corrected by the Senator now.

Mr. CUMMINS. The amendment provides that the Secretary of Labor may designate a person or persons in his department to do this work.

Mr. KERN. In his department. That is the very question I was calling attention to. What person is there in his department who has such leisure now or who will have such leisure in the coming years to take upon himself the difficult work, for it will be a difficult work, of enforcing the provisions of this law?

I repeat, the Senator from Iowa and myself are working to the same end precisely; I know he is interested in the successful administration of this law, and I am sure I am; the only question between us is as to how its provisions may best be carried out. I believe with this great nonpartisan association that has brought a bill here, it can be best carried out and best administered by a commission specially appointed for that purpose. I presume that no President of the United States can be found, no matter what political party has elected him, who will appoint any board to administer this law that is out of sympathy with the law. There are no adverse interests that will conflict before the board. It is only a question of a just administration of the law. The parties who apply for relief are all employees of the Government. The only question is as to whether or not they bring themselves within the purview of the law.

I have heard that the Secretary of Labor has said—he has not said it to me—that there are two difficulties about the administration of the law by his department. In the first place, all the employees of the Department of Labor who were injured in any way would have to have their claims settled by the department to which they belong, and of the administration in that way there would be criticism or there would be likely to be criticism. That is not my idea at all. If the Secretary of Labor said this he may be unduly sensitive, but I can see with a thousand or two thousand employees how he would hesitate about having any employees of his passing on claims of those in the same department who would be injured.

It was supposed, I imagine also, that the clerks who would have to be called upon for the administration of the law, because the Secretary of Labor could not give it his personal attention and would not be expected to give it his personal attention, perhaps engaged in mere routine work would not take the interest in the subject they had to consider as would a commission which was appointed and charged with the execution of the law. I suppose it was thought by those who framed the bill that if a commission were appointed it would look further into the general subject than a set of mere clerical employees would do. The question of vocational disease is very closely allied to this, and it would be interesting if this board were given power to make an investigation along those lines.

I know the general question has received very thoughtful consideration. I think that is all I care to say on this subject. I believe with those who framed the bill that the law can best be carried out by a commission. If that be true or if there be a doubt on the question, I do not think the expenditure of $12,000 ought to stand in the way of a successful administration of the law.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I am just as much in favor of the passage of the bill as is the Senator from Indiana, but I have my doubts about the value of a commission in handling these affairs. I think the Department of Labor would be more nearly in touch with the general conditions governing labor and therefore more easily brought into direct touch with the rights of the laboring man when he becomes injured.

Another thing, a commission does not come into close touch with the general run of the working people. They are a divided body, a composite body, and as a general rule they have never been a complete success in the administration of any public business. We have had the Galveston plan, the Des Moines plan of a commission form of city government. The idea came up in Galveston after a calamity which compelled that city to the prompt adoption of a sort of vigilance committee or commission which would be independent of anybody's interest, and it worked charmingly. Then Des Moines, Iowa, adopted it and it went all over the United States, but there has come something of a revulsion, doubts have arisen and a difference of opinion. If it is a commission of three there are three heads, if a commission of five there are five heads, or of seven, seven heads, each one differing a little from the viewpoint of the other members. "Too many cooks spoil the broth." That is a saying as old as history. When too many men govern they do not bring about ideal results. I think it is a mistake. I would much prefer to have a single commissioner rather than to have a commission. We are going to have a tariff commission, and I think it would be a good idea to have a single tariff commissioner.

If this is put into the hands of a single person, of a single department, more particularly the Department of Labor, which is intrusted with the general condition, I think you would find that workingmen employed by the Government would have their rights handled to better advantage than by an outside commission, a body composed of men who may or may not be familiar with such questions and they must become familiar with them. The strongest-minded man, the most ambitious member of that commission, will either mold the ideas of the others or cause doubts to arise either for better or for worse.

We have changed in some of our cities on the coast from a single mayor with the veto power, and a council elected from different precincts, and have adopted the commission form of government. So far as the average running of municipalities is concerned, letting things come as they will, we have not the evil that existed with the old partisan council; they have improved conditions, but they are far short of arriving at ideal management in municipal government.

I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, and I am in favor of it because I think it is better. I would be in favor of a single commissioner. It is not an expensive commission, but they will build up another bureau unto themselves. This Government is a government of bureaus. A lot of gentlemen are sitting around here in great dignity, and they think they run the Government. It is a delusion. The bureaus run it.

We but make the appropriations and much talk, but the general affairs of the people are not going on in a manner which is a credit either to this body or to the Nation at large. I should like to see this work in the hands of an already existing department which is in immediate touch with the general situation and for the benefit, if you please, I will say to the Senator from Indiana, of the laboring man.

Mr. KERN. What bureau has the Senator in mind? Whom does the Senator propose shall administer this law?

Mr. LANE. The Department of Labor.

Mr. KERN. Come right down to the fact. What particular person do you propose shall personally administer the law?

Mr. LANE. I would put it in the hands of the Secretary of Labor and give him means to hire a superintendent and clerks to present the facts to him. A commission will have to hire many of them; you must construct quarters for them or rent a building. We have not now buildings enough to house those who are already employed by the Government. Commissions are removed from the people by necessity, retired, if you please, to themselves in private conference, and such is not good, in my judgment. For that reason I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, from the committee I presented one amendment to the bill which the Senator from Indiana opposed and the Senator from Iowa opposed, and, finally, while I still voted for it, I practically surrendered it.

Now, in this instance I am entirely in sympathy with the framers of the bill, with the friends of the measure, who have studied it so long. I may have been wrong as to the one I advocated myself. I was against their views upon that measure. I am sure I am right now in supporting their views and in supporting the Senator from Indiana.

The Secretary of Labor can not administer this bill. He can not do anything himself about it. He is occupied now. This measure is entitled to a distinctive head, to responsible persons who will supervise the administration of this law and bear before the public the responsibility. You dump it into the Department of Labor and say to the public nominally the Secretary of Labor is responsible. He can not handle it. He must name somebody else. Under the plan of the friends of this measure, under the plan of the bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana in the Senate and now passed by the House, we will have three responsible men responsible to the country for the supervision and direction and administration of this measure.

I very cordially support the views of the Senator from Indiana upon this subject, and hope the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will not prevail.

Mr. LANE. I should like to say, with all due courtesy to the Senator who has just spoken, that he does not by this amendment secure a responsible head; but, as he states himself, he secures three heads. There is the trouble. If we had a single commissioner it would be much better, but to place it under three heads you have a divided commission.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not agree at all with the Senator from Oregon. I believe in the wisdom of numbers. I believe that three good men conferring together and cooperating to administer this law will administer it better than one, and so do the friends of the measure.

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I mean the friends of this particular bill. I do not mean at all that the Senator from Iowa is not just as much in favor of legislation of this kind as I am.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not true either that the friends of the measure outside of Congress are all for the creation of a commission. That is assumed sometimes, but it is not true. I do not say that either the Senator from Georgia or the Senator from Indiana so claim, but there is an atmosphere here that all those who have studied this subject a long time and have organized themselves into a society to develop it are in favor of creating a commission. I know that it is not true, although there are many of them; I agree to that; but most of them are for a commission for no reason given by the Senator from Georgia, but for a reason that was outlined by the Senator from Indiana. The reason is it is hoped that the commission will expand and take in a great many other subjects than mere compensation.

The Senator from Indiana said, and he said truly, that it was hoped this commission will finally become the source of investigations of vocational disease, and that is only one of a dozen things which they hope the commission will finally be empowered to do. I am not out of sympathy with all these investigations at all, but I am in favor of taking care of them as they come along and as they become absolutely necessary. We are doing a great deal of work along that line now through organized departments of the Government.

I am opposed to the commission partly because it is a mere cloak for a function that is not at all related to compensation. If you were to strip the subject down to its bare bone and look simply at the award of compensation to injured employees, I doubt whether many of those who have been interested in this subject would favor a commission rather than the Department of Labor. It is the history of this country, and every other, too, that these things develop. If this commission is created, I think one man with a fair body of examiners at his command can administer this law and do it with justice, because the commission is not to be composed of men of eminence or distinction. The commission is to be composed of men who are willing to work for $4,000 a year. You can not get men who are capable of exploring these unknown fields of disease for $4,000 a year.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The only place to do that work is with the Health Department, already organized, with the surgeons there. I would be utterly opposed to attaching it to this commission or to the Department of Labor.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of that; but has the Senator any doubt that those who are laboring so diligently for a commission instead of the Secretary of Labor have that in mind?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I had never heard it before it was mentioned on the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Indiana heard it, because he gave it utterance a few moments ago, and I have heard it from many sources since it was known that I would propose the amendment restoring this function to the Secretary of Labor.

I do not oppose a commission because it will cost $12,000 a year for the salaries of three commissioners. I am numb about the expenditure of money. It does not make any difference about the expenditure of money; I have no judgment about it any more. When we propose here, as we do every day, to spend millions and millions and millions, one gets accustomed to ignoring ordinary economical considerations. We voted yesterday to pay out $50,000,000 which I think will be entirely wasted. Do not accuse me of any particular niceties about the expenditure of money. I am opposed, however, to the distribution of power in this way and to the accumulation of men around a commission who are unnecessary to do the work.

I said in the beginning, and I say now, that it would take 10 men to do the work for the commission where one will do it if it is under the supervision of the Secretary of Labor. They must have a certain number of employees in order to secure a standing. What would a commission be considered if it had only one room and only three or four clerks? It would be utterly ignored. It will have a suite of 20 rooms.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We ought to have force enough to control matters of that sort and refuse to permit expenditures we deem unwise.

Mr. CUMMINS. We have not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope we will grow in capacity to resist useless expenditures.

Mr. CUMMINS. I mean to say, if the commission is created, it will have a suite of 20 rooms in some building in Washington, and it will have a hundred clerks. I am simply estimating the subject; I do not know, but that has been the history of such things. But my chief objection is that it belongs to the Department of Labor, and the Secretary of Labor can bestow upon this work the same supervision that he bestows upon every other work which is committed to his care. He does personally but little, I assume, of the work required of the Department of Labor, but his eye surveys it all and his influence dominates it all. That is the reason why I am in favor of giving him the administration of this law.

Mr. JONES. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. This information may have been given to the Senate by the Senator in charge of the bill. I was out during a part of his remarks. The Senator from Iowa has given this matter a great deal of consideration. It was taken up, I understand, in the Judiciary Committee. I wish to ask him if there is any estimate as to how many employees of the Government would probably be injured; in other words, How many claims are likely to require adjudication annually?

Mr. CUMMINS. No such estimate has been made and probably it would be impossible. I stated when the Senator was out of the Chamber that out of the 100,000 employees now covered by the law which awards some compensation there are between four and five thousands injuries, great and little, during the course of a year.

Mr. JONES. Out of the 100,000 who are in specially hazardous employments?

Mr. CUMMINS. They are in specially hazardous employments. The 300,000 or more who will be added by this measure will not add proportionately to the number. I am sure they include the clerks and other employees whose occupations are exceedingly safe.

Mr. President, upon this amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

So the amendment of Mr. CUMMINS was rejected.

Mr. HUSTING obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire now to present an additional amendment, to be known as section 28a, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to yield to me to complete the amendments of the committee?

Mr. HUSTING. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia on behalf of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section, to be known as section 28a, to read as follows:

SEC. 28a. Upon the organization of the said commission the work of the Department of Labor connected with the adjustment of claims of employees of the United States for injuries shall cease, and all pending investigations and proceedings in the Department of Labor in connection therewith shall be continued by the commission. All clerks and employees now engaged in carrying on said work exclusively in the Department of Labor shall be transferred to and become employees of the commission at their present grades and salaries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDNG OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 8, it is proposed to strike out the words "or by the employees" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "with," so that if amended it will read:

That the United States shall pay compensation as hereinafter specified for the disability or death of an employee resulting from a personal injury sustained while in the performance of his duty, but no compensation shall be paid if the injury or death is caused by the willful misconduct of the employee with intention to bring about the injury or death of himself or of another.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I offer this amendment for the reason that I think it makes clear what must have been the purpose of the bill. If it was the purpose or the intent of the bill to withhold compensation for any willful misconduct that had no connection with the injury at all, then it injects something into the bill that I do not think ought to be in it.

Putting the question of willful misconduct in this bill not in any way connected with the injury, except, perhaps, going from one machine to another or not doing his work in just exactly the manner in which he had been directed, would merely once more be putting back into this bill the question of negligence. It seems to me that if any willful misconduct is going to be penalized it should only be when that misconduct leads to or is the proximate cause of the injury. While I do not care to be holding before the Senate what other States have done, I do not believe there is any compensation act where the question of negligence has not been eliminated—that is, ordinary negligence—but that the law provides that only in case of gross negligence, which amounts to a willful purpose or a willful act on the part of the employee for the very purpose of injuring himself or subjecting himself to injury, is put in those laws. It seems to me this amendment will take care of any willful misconduct on the part of an employee who wantonly or willfully subjects himself to an injury; in other words, as to a man who wants to injure himself. That is the kind of conduct that ought not to entitle an employee to compensation, because it is not an incident of his employment, but is something that is entirely extraneous from the employment itself. When an employee, for the purpose of receiving compensation for some reason, goes and willfully injures himself in order to secure compensation, he ought not to receive it, because it is not something that ought to be charged up to the industry; but any other misconduct which might be termed willful, such as going from one machine to another or not strictly obeying the orders received or anything else of this kind which in a court of law would be termed "ordinary negligence," ought not to be put into this bill.

I am afraid that "willful misconduct" will be construed by the commission to mean disobedience to orders or things of that kind, which, while perhaps connected with the injury, in that the injury would not have occurred had the orders been obeyed, yet under the broad terms of the compensation act they ought not to prevent a recovery. I trust the amendment may be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUSTING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. HUSTING. I call for a division.

The question being put, on a division the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

COST OF LIVING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is one little matter that I should like to have disposed of, namely, House joint resolution 91.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if it is going to take any time or involve debate, I will have to object. I only desire about five minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think it will take any time or lead to debate. It is Order of Business 585, and provides for an inquiry by the Department of Labor into the cost of living in the District of Columbia. It has been reported favorably, and I do not believe there is any objection to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of the joint resolution, but I did intend to ask unanimous consent that the calendar be taken up for the consideration of bills to which there is no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will join in that just as soon as the joint resolution is disposed of, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will not object to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a joint resolution, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 91) authorizing and directing the Department of Labor to make an inquiry into the cost of living in the District of Columbia and to report thereon to Congress as early as practicable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Georgia if he seriously thinks that the expenditure of the $6,000 proposed to be appropriated by the joint resolution will result in any benefit to anybody?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, I am not prepared myself to say that it will, but the friends of the measure seem to think it will accomplish good, and I am only acting for them.

Mr. REED. I thought I had the floor. I do not want to yield it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I feel constrained to object to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I hope the Senator will not object. This is a matter in which one of the Representatives from Colorado is very much interested. There can not be anything wrong in it. It affects a solution of the question as to what sum of money women who are employed in various occupations in the District are able to live on.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not apply only to women; it applies to all of the people of the District of Columbia, and I know of no reason why we should not investigate the cost of living in New Hampshire just as well as in the District of Columbia. I object to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

SAMUEL GOMPERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I would not take the time of the Senate just now, but I am obliged to leave the city this evening, and the matter I wish to call attention to has now been allowed to pass unnoticed too long.

On August 15, in the course of a speech, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] saw fit to go outside of the record and outside of any question being considered by the Senate to make certain remarks regarding members of the Cabinet and officials of the Department of Labor, and regarding Mr. Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor. The Government officials to whom he referred may, and doubtless will, if they consider the attack worthy of attention, reply in their own way. My attention has been directed to this matter by Mr. Gompers in a letter; and, in view of the fact that the attack was placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under the privileges of the Senate, I think Mr. Gompers's reply ought to be given equal publicity, especially in view of this challenge which the Senator from Illinois included in his remarks. I quote:

> Gird up your loins, Mr. Gompers, and answer me like a man. I will teach him a few degrees of active, practical civic decency in my country that he does not know of if he will only come out and give the people a chance.

Mr. President, in the course of his remarks the Senator from Illinois also used this language:

> No more insufferable control or tyranny ever cursed a country than these parasitical men who exploit labor and live off the sweat of somebody else's brow. Mr. Gompers is a public nuisance.

He also attacked another gentleman. I quote:

> Mr. Keegan is a Socialist, or in all probability what might be denominated an economic crank; and they are the ones who find lodgment in high places and are in high favor in this administration, from Redfield clear down to Mr. Keegan, or clear up, I do not know which it is.

A little further on the Senator from Illinois said:

> I will say now what I said publicly in 1914 about Mr. Gompers. Before Mr. Gompers criticizes any one in public life I ask him to remember that in the conspiracy leading to the indictment of the dynamiters at Indianapolis, Ind., before they were tried, before the instrumentalities provided by the Department of Justice had resulted in a public hearing where justice might be administered, Mr. Gompers set up a tribunal of his own and tried them and had them acquitted. He prostituted the cause of labor to the point of using the funds of the laboring men of this country to defend these criminals who had without cause, wantonly, in cold blood, sent to their death 19 men and women in the city of Los Angeles, Cal.
> After he had tried them and found them innocent, almost before the ink was dry upon his statement of their innocence, the McNamaras pleaded guilty, and are now engaged in penal pursuits at the behest of an indulgent State where they are removed from the scene of their murderous activities.
> Mr. Gompers has never apologized to the law-abiding men of the country, but here and now I say the most fortunate thing that has ever happened to Mr. Gompers is that he escaped indictment himself upon a similar charge in the same conspiracy.

Then follows this statement:

> It is high time some one said a few wholesome things of Mr. Gompers. It will serve to arrest a vicious tendency to let him run riot in the methods of intimidation and coercion he has habitually employed against men of both parties for several years.

Then the challenge "Gird up your loins, Mr. Gompers," which I already have read. Then this paragraph comes:

> Mr. Gompers is now supporting the Democratic ticket and I am perfectly satisfied to have him do so. He is welcome, and the party is welcome to his support. I do not know what his original politics was, if he ever had any. I think he follows about the same characteristics as the McNamara brothers do, and preys upon all in turn, playing no favorites at any time where benefits can be acquired.

Mr. President, a moment ago, before I took the floor, the Senator from Illinois was in his seat, but left before I rose. I at once sent a messenger to try to find him, because I wanted to make these observations in his presence. He has not returned to the Chamber, and I assume, of course, the messengers were unable to locate him.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think the Senator must be mistaken when he says the Senator from Illinois was in his seat a little while ago.

Mr. REED. I was not mistaken; I saw him.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator who sits next to him did not see him, and I did not see him.

Mr. REED. The Senator was in his seat, and I saw him a few moments ago. Perhaps he was not in his own seat, but he was in the Chamber, unless I am afflicted with bad eyesight. So what I am going to say is a very different statement than I would make if the Senator from Illinois were here, because if he were here I should make the statement very much more forceful. I am now informed that on the last roll call, which occurred only a few moments ago, the Senator from Illinois did answer to his name. I make that statement only because it fortifies my statement that the Senator was in the room a few minutes ago.

Mr. President, I hold no brief for Mr. Gompers, but I regard it as a misfortune that a man should be practically accused on the floor of the Senate of being a murderer, if not that of being in league with murderers, and of being one who preys upon society, when the sole offense of which he appears to be recently guilty, according to the statement of the Senator from Illinois, is that he is supporting the Democratic ticket.

I sometimes think it is a misfortune that men on the floor of the Senate are immune from the pains and penalties of the law against libel and slander. I have known Mr. Gompers in a way—not intimately, but I have been thrown in contact with him—for a number of years. I have had occasion to follow his public acts; for I speak of his acts in connection with the great labor organization to which he belongs as in the nature of quasi-public acts. I have never known him to do an unjust or unlawful act. Instead of being an instigator of strife, it is well known that he is one of the most conservative advisers of that great body of men of which he is the head. I challenge any man to point to a single time when Mr. Gompers has not sought to promote the interests of the great laboring classes of this country by peaceful means.

It is true that in this vast army of organized labor there have been extremists, and it is true undoubtedly that the McNamaras dipped their hands in the blood of their fellow men; but that they represented the sentiment and desire of organized labor no decent man in this country will charge.

There have been men, there are occasional individuals, who attach themselves to every society, to every organization, whether secular or ecclesiastical, who do so for sinister and evil purposes, who reflect by their acts discredit upon the organizations to which they belong. There are men who have sat in this Chamber whose words and conduct have not added luster to this body. But only the most narrow, the most prejudiced, the most evil-minded of men will charge the individual act of one wicked man to an entire body of men.

Mr. SHERMAN entered the Chamber.

Mr. REED. I am glad to observe that the Senator from Illinois has entered the Chamber. The man who will condemn organized labor because two or three of its members individually engaged in a murder conspiracy will make a charge and issue a decree of condemnation which is discreditable to its author.

It is true a number of men were tried and convicted, but of what? Of willful murder, as the Senator's remarks would seem to charge? They were convicted under this section of the statutes, and upon no other:

> It shall be unlawful to transport, carry, or convey any dynamite, gunpowder, or other explosive between a place in a foreign country and a place within or subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, or between a place in any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, and a place in any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, on any vessel or vehicle of any description operated by a common carrier, which vessel or vehicle is carrying passengers for hire.

The charge was that dynamite had been sent in that way by somebody. The great majority of these men were connected with that charge through certain letters they had written, and in a number of instances those letters were as susceptible of a perfectly innocent construction as of an evil one. I say now, touching three men who were convicted from my own State, all of whom I personally know, that I do not believe they had any more idea of engaging in a criminal enterprise than I believe the Senator from Illinois would engage in such an enterprise.

The Senator said that Mr. Gompers was fortunate in escaping indictment. Why? Does he know of any act of Mr. Gompers that is indictable? Or was that the mere explosion of the Senator under the privileges of this floor?

It is true, not that Mr. Gompers but that the controlling board of the American Federation of Labor, believing that these men were innocent, furnished them some funds for defense; and a number of men were declared to be innocent. Every man in this world is entitled to a proper defense in court; and the furnishing of money to afford him that defense is not a criminal act in and of itself; nor does it make the man who furnished the money particeps criminis, nor justly place him in a position where he can be assailed on this or any other floor as a fellow conspirator in acts of murder. Neither is such an act as I have referred to—as has been suggested to me by a Senator sitting by my side—inconsistent with the highest citizenship.

Mr. President, I do not know whether Mr. Gompers is supporting the Democratic ticket or not. I do not know whether Mr. Gompers ever takes part in politics. I do not know whether he is a Republican or a Democrat. I would naturally infer that his leanings would be toward the Democratic Party, because he has expended the forces of a truly great mind and the energies of a great heart in endeavoring to conserve the interests of the great body of the common people. When this kind of charge is made against Mr. Gompers, it is not a reflection upon him alone. For many years he has stood at the head of the organized labor of the United States—that vast body of men whose brains and energies run every great industry of this land; whose powerful backs and mighty arms are producing the wealth of this country; who guide the locomotive through the storm and the night, drawing its precious freightage of human lives; who stand within the glare of roaring furnaces, and, at the brink of death, snatch wealth for the benefit of all; who toil in the starless night of the mine and bring up the glittering gold and the shining coal for the benefit of all the world; who meet upon the Sabbath day in temples of religion and at their firesides bow before the God that made us all; who in the light and shadow of life gather their families about them and fight the battle of existence for the benefit of wife and child and country; who have enlisted in every war and died on every battle field; whose blood is our blood; whose hearts are attuned to the highest character of citizenship and manhood. That great body of men have placed and kept at their head for many years Samuel Gompers; and an attack such as has been made upon him is an attack upon the men who have so long honored him and so faithfully followed him.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator says that he does not know that Mr. Gompers has ever taken part in politics. The Senator recalls the fact that Mr. Gompers and three or four other men with him went into Maine a few years ago for the announced purpose of defeating Mr. Littlefield because Mr. Littlefield had not agreed to the matters that Mr. Gompers undertook to force through Congress.

Mr. REED. I said I did not know whether he was a Democrat or a Republican; but I expect that, when he finds a man who has absolutely stood against the interests not only of labor but of the country, he has voted against him and perhaps worked against him. Incidentally, the lobby investigations of this body will show that in that same election an organized lobby, having its headquarters in this town, sent its emissaries into Maine to work for Mr. Littlefield and the Republican ticket, and sent its funds there to corrupt labor men and to flood that State with money.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, what I meant to say to the Senator was that I think he is mistaken when he says that Mr. Gompers does not interfere in elections. Mr. Gompers invaded New Hampshire last November and issued a proclamation containing 12 counts against the Republican candidate, almost every one of which was either untrue or partially untrue, and rallied the forces all over that State.

Mr. REED. That is, against the Senator himself?

Mr. GALLINGER. It was against me personally; yes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I so like the Senator personally that I would dislike to vote against him in his own State; but, believing, as I do, that the Senator's whole idea of public business is a mistake, if I lived in the Senator's State I would have to bring some charges against him myself, and I have not any doubt that if he lived in my State he would reciprocate.

Mr. GALLINGER. If I lived in Missouri I would reciprocate; no doubt of it.

Mr. REED. But I would not expect, because I went into his State, that any man anywhere would accuse me of being a criminal.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, I am not discussing that feature of it, Mr. President; not at all. I merely wanted to suggest that Mr. Gompers does interfere in politics in this country, and interferes oftentimes in a way that is utterly unjustifiable.

Mr. REED. Well, now, for instance, he went to the State of Maine when there was an organized lobby known as the Manufacturers' Association, represented by that distinguished gentleman, Col. Mulhall, doing business in that State. Mr. Gompers went there to make speeches, I presume, against him. Is there anything wicked or wrong about that?

Mr. GALLINGER. It simply disproves the Senator's contention that Mr. Gompers does not interfere in politics.

Mr. REED. I did not make that statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understood the Senator to say so.

Mr. REED. I said I did not know whether he was a Democrat or a Republican.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator went beyond that.

Mr. REED. But I can understand that, being a good citizen and being interested in labor, he naturally went up to offset the effect of the lobby that was operating in Maine in the interest of the Republican ticket.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. Then he was a Democrat, of course.

Mr. REED. Why, he was at that time acting not only in the cause of Democracy but in the cause of good citizenship.

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps so.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator from Missouri know whether or not Gompers, junior—Samuel J. Gompers—is on the Democratic pay roll under this administration in a political office?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not know whether Mr. Gompers has a son or not. Does the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall in due time enlighten the Senate as to the condition of the Gompers family with reference to the public pay rolls, and also with reference to drawing subsistence from various labor unions in this country.

Mr. REED. But if Samuel Gompers has a son, and the son is upon the pay roll and is drawing a salary from the Government, is that any warrant for attacking the father? Does it close the mouth of the father so that he can not speak? Does it give occasion to intimate that he is a murderer?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is wandering from the question. I was asking if there was not some cumulative evidence on the question of whether Mr. Gompers at times engages in politics. I will get to the question, as, no doubt, the Senator will before he concludes, of Mr. Gompers's connection with various matters of public concern other than political ones.

Mr. REED. Well, I declare I do not know why I was interrupted now. Is it the idea of the Senator that, if Mr. Gompers has a son working down here in a department, it is a crime, or that it proves that he is a Democrat? Why, it does not even prove that the son is a Democrat. It does not, under this administration, even raise a strong presumption that he is a Democrat. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope that will be heard in Missouri, as the Senator is a candidate.

Mr. REED. There is not anything I say on the floor of the Senate that I will not be glad to repeat in Missouri. The only real complaint I have against this administration is that it has kept too many Republicans in office.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me inquire, if the Senator will permit me, whether it would be any evidence if Gompers, jr., held an office not under the civil service, but one which is political in character, or might be made so?

Mr. REED. It might be some slight evidence that Gompers, jr., was a Democrat, but what of it? It is not a crime yet for a man to have a son; and although the Senator from Illinois may differ, I venture to say that it is not yet regarded as a crime to be a Democrat.

But I am talking about this sort of language of the Senator from Illinois:

> Mr. Gompers is a public nuisance. * * * I ask him to remember that in the conspiracy leading to the indictment of the dynamiters at Indianapolis, Ind., before they were tried, before the instrumentalities provided by the Department of Justice had resulted in a public hearing where justice might be administered, Mr. Gompers set up a tribunal of his own and tried them and had them acquitted. He prostituted the cause of labor to the point of using the funds of the laboring men of this country to defend these criminals who had, without cause, wantonly, in cold blood, sent to their death 19 men and women in the city of Los Angeles, Cal.

The money that was employed was used to defend men in the city of Indianapolis not one of whom was charged with murder. I am talking about such language as this in connection with that which I have just quoted:

> I say the most fortunate thing that has ever happened to Mr. Gompers is that he escaped indictment himself upon a similar charge in the same conspiracy.
> * * * * * * *
> I think he follows about the same characteristics as the McNamara brothers do, and preys upon all in turn, playing no favorites at any time where benefits can be acquired.

It had just been charged by the Senator, and it is well known, that the McNamara brothers were murderers of the blackest type. Here is the language:

> I think he—
> Gompers—
> follows about the same characteristics as the McNamara brothers do, and preys upon all in turn, playing no favorites at any time where benefits can be acquired.

If the Senator will make that charge off the floor of the Senate, where he has not the legal protection which is afforded in this Chamber, I will guarantee a judgment in libel if he makes it in writing and in slander if he makes it orally.

Now, Mr. President, Mr. Gompers wrote the Senator from Illinois a letter. I will read a copy of it, and that is all I have to say:

> AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
> Washington, D. C., August 17, 1916.
> Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
> Senator from Illinois,
> Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.
> DEAR SIR: A few days ago, among a number of things that you took occasion to discuss in addressing the United States Senate when the merchant-marine bill was under consideration, you made a violent attack upon me personally.
>
> I shall not undertake here to make answer to your misrepresentation of me; your willful, malicious, false, and unwarrantable accusations and insinuations, they may well be left for discussion at some other time. But there is not a word I have uttered nor an action I have taken but which has been directed and approved by the American Federation of Labor and its great rank and file. The only inference of your attack, therefore, is not upon me personally or officially but upon the policy, principles, and activity of the American Federation of Labor and the whole body of wage earners who has been and are striving in an American fashion and lawful manner to secure a better standard of life, and equal rights and concepts of these rights with every other citizen of our Republic.
> After assuring the President of the Senate that you would not occupy the floor so long as the last time you indulged in some comments on the shipping bill, you then, by way of explaining your position upon that bill, declared "Mr. Gompers is a public nuisance." It is a necessary inference that the portion of your remarks immediately following constitute the grounds for your judgment. The natural interpretation of your various assertions is that the political policy of the American Federation of Labor is displeasing to you, and inevitably raises the question whether or not you would have stigmatized the president of the American Federation of Labor as a public nuisance if he had publicly indorsed the Members of the United States Senate, including yourself, had you voted in favor of excluding associations of wage earners from the application of antitrust legislation.
> And I am again constrained to wonder if you would have stigmatized me as a public nuisance had you found me pliant and usable in furthering your political aspirations or if you thought my personal influence or the influence of my office could be secured by offer of reward, whether money or office.
> From both the tone and the context of your remarks upon the merchant-marine bill it is evident that you are addressing all those who shall vote at the polls in the November election rather than the lawmakers who constitute the United States Senate. The insinuations you make are calculated to appeal to the prejudiced, but they are repugnant to honest men who have regard for the good name of a man who for years has contributed the best that is in him to the cause of humanity.
> I have never attempted and do not now attempt, as I have not the power, to deliver the vote of any man or group of men. I am intrusted with the affairs of the American labor movement as guided and decided by the rank and file of the workers of America.
> If the truth which I state as to the antagonism toward labor and labor's interests and the interests of the people generally is intolerable to you or to any other man, that is not my fault. It is impossible for me to be either tyrannical or arbitrary, for there are no such powers vested in the president of the American Federation of Labor. As an officer in the labor movement, and as a citizen, it is my right and my duty to advise my fellow citizens and fellow workers.
> I am thankful that I was not indicted either with the "Indianapolis dynamiters" or with any others. I imagine that you ought to be thankful that you were not indicted with bank defaulters, trust speculators, and other buccaneers in the industrial and commercial field; simply because you believed in their innocence is no good grounds for your indictment, no more than for mine when the "Indianapolis dynamiters" declared their innocence and I believed them to be innocent.
> It comes with bad grace from you, Senator SHERMAN, to make so unwarrantable an attack upon one who at least can hold up his head equally with you before his fellow citizens in any assembly or before the bar of public opinion of America. You have endeavored to call me before your partisan political tribunal——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. If that language had been uttered by a Senator on this floor, he would have been called to order under the rule, and I submit it is in bad taste to bring a letter from an outside party into the Senate and read it when it criticizes Members of the Senate. I think it ought not to be done.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I claim it is not a criticism. I call the Senator's attention to the language. I do not think he heard it aright.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator on his own responsibility had said it was fortunate that the Senator from Illinois had not been indicted because of his relations to bank robbers and all that sort of thing, the Senator would have been called to order.

Mr. REED. That is not what the letter said. The Senator did not hear it aright.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the way I heard it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not say that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to have it read again and see if it does not say that.

Mr. REED. The Senator will notice the language. I am reading it again for the benefit of the Senator:

> I am thankful that I was not indicted either with the "Indianapolis dynamiters" or with any others. I imagine that you ought to be thankful that you were not indicted with bank defaulters, trust speculators, and other buccaneers in the industrial and commercial field; simply because you believed in their innocence is no good grounds for your indictment, no more than for mine when the "Indianapolis dynamiters" declared their innocence, and I believed them to be innocent.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senate is of opinion that a man outside of this Chamber can write a scurrilous letter to a Member of this body and have it read in this body criticizing a Member of the body, then I have nothing further to say. I know the time has been in this body when it would not have been allowed, and it ought not to be allowed now.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think I know the courtesies and decencies of debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will allow the Chair just one moment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Gompers has the public press at his disposal and he has the street corners if he wishes to occupy them, but he has not any right to come into this body and have a Senator repeat any such scurrilous talk as is in that letter.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this is what I understand this language to be and nothing except this: He says, in effect, to the Senator from Illinois, "You charge that I ought to be thankful I was not indicted with the dynamiters, whom I believe to be innocent. I might reply to you and say with equal justice you are fortunate in not being indicted with bank defaulters whom you believe to be innocent." In other words, he simply analyzes the argument and shows the absurdity. It is not an attack upon the Senator from Illinois. If I so understood it I would not read it. I do not put the construction on it the Senator does. I think I know the decencies of debate and the rules of this forum. I have frequently received, as we have all received, letters reflecting upon some other Senator. I have not read them. This, I take, is merely in effect saying, "You are unjust when you charge me with being a party to a conspiracy simply because I believed the men to be innocent, just as I would be unjust to charge you with being a bank defaulter because you may have believed in the innocence of those men."

Mr. GALLINGER. Those men were tried in a court of the country and condemned and sentenced. Yet Mr. Gompers has the effrontery to say that he believes them innocent.

Mr. REED. He said he believed they were innocent at the time he took this action. I believe, notwithstanding the conviction, some of those men were innocent of any wrongful or criminal intent, and I say that after a considerable examination of the record.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. But I do believe that the McNamara brothers, and perhaps some others, were guilty, and that the men who were guilty deserved the sternest punishment the law could have administered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. Partly answering the Senator, I ask him if he believes any of the defendants in the case named were guilty—any two or more?

Mr. REED. There may have been some of them. The evidence was pretty convincing against them.

Mr. SHERMAN. You said you believed some of them were guilty?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. You have not said in reply to the question propounded whether you believed any two or more of them were guilty.

Mr. REED. I say that I thought from my examination of the evidence it was pretty conclusive against some of those men.

Mr. SHERMAN. I assume, then, the Senator thinks some of them were properly convicted?

Mr. REED. I think that is probably true.

I continue reading this letter:

> You have endeavored to call me before your partisan political tribunal and to convict me of divers crimes, even without trial. You then advocate pitiless publicity and challenge me to answer you "like a man." I accept your challenge, and will meet you in any public forum that you may designate, whether in Washington or in the metropolis of the State you represent, in order that the people "may be given a chance" to judge as to the justice of your attack and as to the wisdom of the political policy of the American Federation of Labor.
> Yours, etc., SAMUEL GOMPERS,
> President American Federation of Labor.

Now, Mr. President, I have said this much because I think in justice it should have been said. I appreciate as much as any man the propriety that ought to be always observed upon this floor, and I say again that I do not find in this letter which I read anything which transgresses the rules or the spirit of the rules of the United States Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to that for the present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. By request of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], chairman of the Finance Committee, who is at this time engaged out of the Chamber, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 16763, to increase the revenue, and for other purposes. He only wishes to make it the unfinished business, and not to have it considered this afternoon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to be heard on the revenue bill for a short time, for the occasion that calls forth the letter read from the distinguished gentleman was very largely an appropriation item in the sundry civil bill some time ago, and some remarks which I considered were a part of my public duty in this body, in order that I might upon the issue raised invoke the verdict of the law-abiding people of this Republic. I am content that the issue be raised in the Senate and that it end at the polls.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield one moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. I took exception to the language that was used in the letter which was read, saying that if the Senator had used it on his own responsibility he would have been called to order and not have been permitted to proceed. Now, I have a copy of that letter in my hand.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is the original.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the original, and here is what this outside man says about a Senator:

> Your willful, malicious, false, and unwarrantable accusations and insinuations.

Mr. President, if that had been uttered by a Senator here he would have been called to order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is just the difficulty as to a ruling on the part of the Chair. The Chair does not care to rule upon this question, and submits it to the Senate. It was not language used by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; and it is much less excusable on that account.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule has nothing to do except with language with which one Senator shall impute evil motives to the conduct of another Senator. The Senator from Missouri, as I understand it, is not adopting the language of the letter; I did not understand him to do anything of that kind; and whether it shall be printed or not is a matter for the Senate to settle. If the Senator from New Hampshire raises the question as to whether it shall go in or be excluded, the Chair will submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I certainly do raise that question. I intended to move that it be stricken from the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That question the Chair leaves to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish simply to say in addition to what I said that a Senator who brings a letter of this kind into the Senate and reads it in his own time becomes responsible for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I would not raise the question myself, because in a manner, whatever the occasion was that called out the letter, I was responsible for that occasion. What the rules of the Senate may be or what the uniform course or procedure for many years has been in the Senate I am not able to say, because I have been a Member here for a comparatively short time. Whatever the rules of the Senate are I shall not undertake to say, but leave that to be determined by the Senate. But on my own account I wish, Mr. President, to say, so that I may not be misunderstood, that I would not complain about this letter nor anything else put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD when I myself have furnished the initial point out of which the documents or letters have grown. If I am willing to give blows, I am equally willing to receive them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator yield to me one moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of the statement just made by the Senator from Illinois, I will not make the motion I suggested that I would make. If the Senator is quite content with the present situation, I have no right to intervene.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am.

Mr. GALLINGER. And I content myself with entering my protest, as I did.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was further induced to take no notice of the matter because once before the Senator from Illinois said he would take care of himself, regardless of the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from New Hampshire wishes or did wish to protect the dignity of the Senate or the uniform course of procedure, I would yield without question; but so far as any protection of the rules might be given the Senator from Illinois, I do not ask that they be invoked.

If Mr. Gompers is able to be elected a Senator in any State of the Union and can come upon the floor, I will meet him on the controversy growing out of the issues named. I am perfectly willing to do so, where the controversy may be discussed upon an equality; but if the laws of dueling, however pernicious they may have been at one time, and which I abhor, were still in force, I would say to Mr. Gompers that I do not fight with anybody except those of my own class.

I would decline, so far as Mr. Gompers is concerned, to engage with him in public debate on a platform politically, socially, ethically, or economically, because we would not meet upon a common footing.

I made whatever remarks I made, Mr. President, in the Senate in discharge of what I considered my official duty. It is true it was a digression from the matter immediately connected with the shipping bill, but certain things had occurred and certain arguments had been used which I thought made it proper for me to raise the question at that time. So I will consider it as properly before the Senate.

I do not think that Mr. Gompers in this letter states his case. Like every other evasive, uncertain, and somewhat vacillating antagonist, he retires behind the shelter of innocent men. He says such criticism as might have been directed against him was a criticism of the American Federation of Labor. He insists that it was a criticism upon the unionized labor of this country. It was not. No one knows it better than Mr. Gompers. He habitually runs to cover that way.

I know something, Mr. President, of the organized labor of this country. I have dealt with them in smaller areas than the jurisdiction of this Senate. I have never been classified as unfair in response to their legitimate demands, either in legislation or in administration. It was reserved for Mr. Gompers to go about over this country seeking politically to destroy all whom he could not own. That is our offense; that is my offense; that is the offense of some of you gentlemen on the other side of the aisle.

In April, 1913, before I had scarcely removed the dust from the vacant seat I then occupied, I was called on to vote in the sundry civil bill on the question of excluding farmers' organizations, horticultural societies, and labor unions from prosecution under a $300,000 item in that appropriation bill designed to prosecute violations of the Sherman antitrust law. I voted to treat union labor and the members of union labor as I vote to treat you, gentleman, in your private capacity. Not a solitary farmer, Mr. President, in all this country complained to me that he felt discriminated against because of our vote on that question; not a solitary horticulturist in all the country made complaint.

I know as much of the farmers' sentiment in this country, I think, as does the average Senator. I was a farmer until I was 23 years of age. All of my relatives, both in Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana, are yet farmers and stock raisers. I think I have produced more useful material for the food, clothing, and shelter of the human family in my time with the work of my hands than Mr. Gompers ever produced in all his life from the time when he was an alien or since he has become a naturalized citizen. I assume he has become a citizen. I never saw the court records to indicate it; but I will take it that he became naturalized before he undertook to run the American Government.

After the vote to which I have referred was taken Mr. Gompers assailed us—and if I mistake not the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] voted as I voted on that question——

Mr. GALLINGER. I certainly did.

Mr. SHERMAN. And others voted that way. It was not a political question. I think some of my Democratic brethren in the Senate voted that way, because they believed that way. Immediately from that issue Mr. Gompers sallied forth into this country breathing fire and slaughter. The Senator from New Hampshire has spoken of the activities of Mr. Gompers in his State and in other States. I know something of his activities. More than a hundred thousand lithograph telegrams were sent out—not at the November election but at the Republican primaries—in Illinois bearing Mr. Gompers's signature, blacklisting the Senator from Illinois, who in the following March would have served 23 months, when the term would have expired, and who was a candidate for reelection. I was blacklisted as unfair to organized labor because of my vote upon the item mentioned.

I knew well enough what would happen when I voted that way. Mr. Gompers was in Washington, if not in the Senate gallery; divers gentlemen representing him are here nearly all the time. We all know it.

The easy way would be to float with the stream of popular affairs in such legislation. We know that to do otherwise breeds trouble. Because of that, Mr. President, Mr. Gompers saw fit to blacklist and to mark for slaughter every Senator who was up for election in 1914 who had voted contrary to his orders. For myself, Mr. President, I say to Mr. Gompers that I shall continue to vote to represent the American people in this Chamber; I shall continue to vote to represent my own constituents secondarily, upon whom I must call for reelection when terms expire. I am an American. I can earn my living to-day with my hands better and more usefully than Mr. Gompers can or ever did. He is a parasite upon the body of organized labor, a creeping poison ivy upon the whole structure of the industrial world.

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, I draw the distinction between legitimate organized labor and those who prostitute their righteous cause.

I have dealt with John Mitchell, with Duncan Macdonald—one of them being at one time president and the other then and still, I believe, the secretary of the Mine Workers' Union of America. We have in my own State 100,000 soft-coal miners, all of whom are unionized. After my vote in this body in April, 1913, Mr. Gompers took the course I have indicated. All the union labor outside of the city of Chicago in the great soft-coal fields in my own State were reached by his communications.

Still he is not in politics. He was interfering in a Republican primary. Unfortunately, Mr. President, he claims to be a Democrat. I do not apprehend that some of you on the other side regard him as any particular accession to your ranks, because he would as soon turn upon you and assault you when you refuse to become his punch-button messenger boy, as he did upon us who refused to do his bidding here three years ago.

He sought, therefore, to control Republican primaries in the first instance. After the nominations were settled we had a fight in the State, a three-cornered fight, Mr. President, because the triangle in politics had not then disappeared in the course of political affairs. So there were at that time three candidates. Mr. Gompers took occasion to support, I think, the Bull Moose candidate in Illinois. I do not know what he did in other States, because he is a political chameleon.

He tells of his devotion to the cause of labor. It is not; it is his devotion to the Gompers family. Samuel J. Gompers, his son, is on the Government pay roll in a $2,500 position under this administration; and if this administration should be unhorsed, Mr. President, he is just as apt, chameleon like, to change his politics and claim office under any other party. With him it is a question largely of anything to stay on the pay roll under any kind of an administration. He is a most liberal gentleman in his tastes when it comes to office holding and to getting money, I repeat, out of the sweat of somebody's else face, whether it be an iron molder in the foundry, whether a brakeman on the trains, whether a woodworker or a leather worker or a worker in the metal trade. He is just as anxious to get the wherewith as anybody in this whole country. So he is devoted to the cause of Gompers, and not the cause of union labor.

I met this gentleman, as others of us did. He was impartial in his blows. I do not know certainly whether or not he hit the Democrats quite as hard as he hit me, but that is a matter of no concern, because I always like a good fight; nobody complains about that, and it is something of that spirit that makes me offer no objection to incorporating Mr. Gompers's letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where it may be preserved for posterity, along with certain other letters which I shall put into the RECORD before I conclude, written likewise by Mr. Gompers.

In the many years that I served in a smaller legislative body, Mr. President, some of the most acute labor questions came to the capitol where I was serving that ever engaged the attention of this country. Chicago, as all know, is in a formative state; matters are not settled, and so the continual struggle between the employer and the employee kept us on the grill a large part of the time. You will not find in the Mississippi Valley, unless based on political reasons, a solitary representative of the union laborers in Chicago or elsewhere, Mr. President, that ever classified me as unfair in dealing with the actual legislation that concerned their craft.

Long before the word "progressive" was ever used, before the phrase "social justice" was invented as a political slogan, we legislated upon questions concerned in those issues. Child-labor laws were enacted many years ago; factory-inspection acts were passed; a revision of the coal mining laws was carried into effect; the union label was protected, so that it could not be used by an unauthorized agent or body; and, without enumerating them all, more than 26 progressive laws dealing with the right of labor to be fairly treated were acted upon and passed into the statutes of the State having within its limits the second largest city on the Western Hemisphere, involving as difficult problems in the labor world as there are in the Republic.

Not a word of complaint was ever heard until Mr. Gompers took it upon his shoulders to destroy Senators in this body who would not take orders from him. I declined to do so. I did not take them then; I will not do so now; and I shall not do so hereafter.

Mr. Gompers says in his letter that organized labor was attacked when I criticized him. Is he "organized labor"? He is the president of the American Federation of Labor, it is true, but count up all who work with their hands, skilled or unskilled, in this country, and put them alongside of the few in that organization that Mr. Gompers can influence, and the latter are an infinitesimal part of the whole body.

It is true the great Federation of Labor is a much larger and more imposing and dignified body than Mr. Gompers, and when I criticized Mr. Gompers I did not criticize him because he was the executive of the American Federation of Labor; I criticized him because he prostituted the temporary power he had for ends illegitimate and foreign to his duty.

The intelligent laboring men of this country can discriminate between criticism of Mr. Gompers and criticism of the union. Mr. Gompers, true to his nature, every time he has ever been attacked, immediately runs to cover behind the shield of the organization that he claims to represent. Mr. Gompers is a bluffer.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. If the Senator thinks he is a bluffer, why does he not accept his challenge to meet him in debate, and not impose the impossible?

Mr. SHERMAN. Because I have better things to do than to spend my time on a platform with a man that I regard as both a bluffer and a political coward. I decline to regard him as a fit antagonist in honorable discussion. Let him run for office the way we do. Let him go before all the people, and not before the chosen few surrounding him. Let him run for office and come into the Senate and meet on an equality. I fight with my own kind, but I resolutely refuse to engage in a scuffling match with one whose ideals of controversy are similar to the defensive methods of an American skunk.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield further?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. REED. The language the Senator has just employed, I notice, does not at all offend the sensibilities of the defender of the rules of the Senate, the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. But if the Senator regards Mr. Gompers as a bluffer and a coward——

Mr. SHERMAN. I am entirely impartial. The Senators can both talk if they do not take me off the floor.

Mr. REED (continuing). Why does not the Senator meet him? If he is too small a creature for the Senator to meet in debate after he has challenged him to do so—that is, the Senator challenged Mr. Gompers in his words which I read—why is he not too small for the Senator to attack here?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Illinois will permit me, as the Senator from Missouri has alluded to me personally, I will say that if the Senator from Missouri stands in the person of Mr. Gompers, I will then invoke the rule. If he does not, I have nothing to do with Mr. Gompers except to regard him in pretty much the same light that the Senator from Illinois does.

Mr. REED. I stand in no person except my own proper person. I simply call attention to the language, not because it was an attack on Mr. Gompers, but because it was, in my opinion, an attack upon the decencies of debate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois will take care of himself, no doubt, on that point. I will risk him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, when I was younger, and had less experience and possibly less sense, I spent some of my time on the platform endeavoring to settle a question with a man of Mr. Gompers's type. I have found out that it is love's labor lost. Not only that, but it is casting pearls before swine. "Should a * * * man * * * reason with unprofitable talk?" querieth the man in Holy Writ, "or with speeches wherewith he can do no good?"

If I did not think I was doing the cause of law-abiding, decent American citizens some service, without regard to whether they are Democrats or Republicans, I would not take my time here this afternoon.

The Senator from Missouri asks why I decline to meet Mr. Gompers and still regard him of enough importance to take time here in the Senate on him. Mr. Gompers assumes to coerce and intimidate Senators who do not obey his orders. He assumes to set up a government above and beyond the law of the land. Any man who does this, and attempts to pervert and abuse the confidence of those who trust, to serve sinister ends is a proper subject for reference in this body. It becomes a duty of a Senator to criticize him.

I would not convince Mr. Gompers by a public debate. I would give him an importance I do not owe him. I would not convince a single one of his followers, who are deluded by his professions of being the great servitor of the laboring men of this country who came to hear either of us.

I repeat, if Mr. Gompers wants to run for the Senate and go through the same experience that every other Senator must, either to obtain or to hold a seat in this body, there is no prohibition upon his so becoming a candidate. We can then meet upon equal terms. I invite him to settle in my own State—it only takes a year's residence—and there enter the primaries of any party he pleases, become a candidate, submit his claims to the polls, and see what the voters of that or any other State of the Union think of him as a candidate for public office.

I am holding a public office, as you Senators are. I obtained it legitimately. No one ever complained about either the methods of the nomination or the methods of the election, because my present title comes in a direct primary and a direct election of the people, as some of you Senators now holding your seats likewise hold your title. So Mr. Gompers has an open field to be heard to try out his ideas of government, or of criticism of those who decline to administer government or to legislate as he demands.

I have this to say, Mr. President: I have never had any trouble with a representative of organized labor except Mr. Gompers. I have dealt with the ones named and with many more. You will not find another one who ever raised his voice to place me upon a blacklist, political or otherwise.

I believe in the cause of organized labor, and my conduct has shown the sincerity of that belief. I would extend labor to go beyond that even of the human hand, because without mingling it with intelligent thought it is nothing but unskilled labor and the crudest of human effort. So I would extend labor to include much more than Mr. Gompers's definition.

We Senators are laborers. We have no eight-hour day here at any time, whether we are approaching the end of the session or otherwise. A laborer is anyone who does anything useful in the great field of human effort, that ministers to the convenience, the comfort, the æsthetic taste or the wants in sickness or health of the human family. Anything that produces food, clothing, or shelter, or renders the human habitation or the head of his family and his family more capable of discharging his duty, making life more tolerable, embellishing, adorning, or dignifying life, can be included under the term of labor.

Three thousand years have elapsed since marbles preserved to this day rang with the sculptor's chisel. They are works of art; and the sublime genius that preserved them to our day was as much a laborer in the great vineyard of human affairs as the man who holds the plowhandle or pours the molten iron into the mold in the foundry. The canvas of Titian or of Rembrandt was as much the result of human labor as the work of the man who holds the throttle in the locomotive. Titian died at 99 years of age, of the plague. It shows how good it is for a man to work at something as long as he can stand on his feet.

So we would include all of these things, but Mr. Gompers excludes them all. Nobody is a laborer, according to him, unless he works with his hands. The more you mix your mind with it, according to Mr. Gompers's definition, the less of a laborer you become.

I protest against the entire philosophy and doctrine of Mr. Gompers. I protest against the infamous doctrine he undertakes to execute in this country in practice, that no man is to be entitled to liberty of action without the covert threat of destruction that he makes every time he sits in the gallery and notes what a roll call discloses. For one, I have grown weary of that dictation. I shall do justice to organized labor in spite of Mr. Gompers, and not because of Mr. Gompers.

I wish to add another paragraph to these general observations. It is my duty. Organized labor in this country will forward its just purposes the more, Mr. President, when it divorces itself from such men as Mr. Gompers.

Mr. Gompers in his letter sees fit to allude to "bankers prosecuted for embezzlement, defalcations, and the like, and other buccaneers of the industrial world," as I remember the phrase, and wishes to know if I consider myself as under suspicion because I sympathized with men who said they were innocent, or because I believed they were innocent.

I never conducted a criminal practice, Mr. President, and for that reason I could do Mr. Gompers no good if I returned to the practice of my profession. I confined myself to civil business, and only upon two or three occasions in my entire lifetime of more than 30 years of miscellaneous practice did I ever defend a man charged with crime. I never in my life defended a banker charged with crime. I never defended a director or a bank officer of any kind charged with crime. I have sued them all with cheerful impartiality in the civil courts, but I never prosecuted or defended any in my life. except that upon one occasion I prosecuted a private banker under the embezzlement laws of our State.

That is the limit of my experience with bankers. I have not for more than 20 years owned shares of stock in any national bank. At one time I owned stock in the old Bankers' National in Chicago. I sold it many, many years ago, before I held any public office of any kind. I have no bank stock now. I have not been in a courtroom for five years this fall, and I have defended no bankers. I never in my life expressed my opinion of the guilt or innocence of any bankers placed upon trial. Neither have I submitted my opinions on the guilt or innocence of defendants to avoid or defeat the ends of justice. I have not undertaken to anticipate the ordinary processes and the trials of a court of justice by declaring that bankers are innocent, rushing into print, and endeavoring to forestall the verdict of a jury or the sentence of a court. I have been content to leave the administration of justice to the ordinary tribunals charged with that responsibility. I have not collected money and defended criminals who pleaded guilty.

It is worth more in this country that the American citizen should let the administration of justice proceed fairly and serenely upon its great mission in popular government than any other duty I can mention, Mr. President.

Let me say to Mr. Gompers, let me say even to those who may sympathize with him, but particularly to those who do not—and I know there are some in the ranks of unionized labor who do not—let me say something that is universal in its application, that is national in its scope, and that is vital in its necessary effects upon the American people:

The mere fact that a man is a member of a labor union gives him no superior rights under the laws of our country. Members of organized labor who break the criminal laws of the land are as much amenable to punishment, and are as justly prosecuted, as anybody else in this country. If a question were evenly balanced in civil or criminal controversy, with union labor on one side awaiting a judgment or a verdict, I would give the laboring men of this country always the benefit of the doubt, either in litigation, prosecution, or legislation. I have had and now have that tender regard for the man who sometimes is not able to present fully his side of the case.

The bane of public life to-day is that there is a double standard of criminality. It is claimed by Mr. Gompers and his school of thought that a given act committed by a union man in the cause of union labor is innocent, while if you or I or two or more of us commit the same act we are guilty of a felony.

I do not subscribe to this doctrine. I believe every union man in the country is as much under the obligation of obeying the laws of this country as I am myself.

If there is to be raised in this country an issue that no crime can be committed by unionized labor, according to Mr. Gompers's belief, then this country is not worth paying taxes for, and is not worth fighting for in war, or behaving yourself in time of peace. If this can not be a government of law, if it must become a government of classes with some punished and others exempted, it ceases to be popular government. It ceases to command my respect. It ceases to command even my allegiance, because this is either the government of all the American people or it is not worthy of the name. It is not a government of labor unions, by the labor unions, over everybody else, exempting them; but it is a government of all of us together.

The sooner we get back to that healthy, sane doctrine of American life, the sooner some of the malignant growths that have fastened themselves upon the body politic will be removed without the surgery of war.

I sound my belief here now—I make the statement advisedly—that the great American issue is not keeping out of war with the Old World, but it is keeping out of civil and internecine strife caused by arraying one class against another and proclaiming the infamous doctrine that the Government is made for some but not for others.

Happily the laboring man, union or nonunion, recognizes this basic truth.

Along with it let them understand equally that when they make an agreement that agreement must be kept. I remember some years ago in some matters connected with the soft-coal miners John Mitchell, who lived in Illinois at that time, was the chief officer of the mine workers' union. The mine worker's union made a schedule, agreed upon it with the coal operators. After a time, when the pinch came, certain of the mine workers' organizations voted to break the agreement. I have always had—whatever other errors he may have committed, this is not one—a very great respect for John Mitchell. I have read his book on labor questions, and it has in it much of value to the thoughtful reader. I have seen him many times under other conditions; but in these circumstances he acted the part of the liberal, strong man. He said to the union to return to their work, to understand that an agreement made by organized labor with their employers was as sacred as the agreement that bound the operator, and threatened them with the loss of their charters if they did not return to work within a given time. That ended that controversy.

Agreements must be kept. There is hardly a week goes past, Mr. President, that at some place the same question does not arise. First, we must abide by the law of the land; next, when agreements are made relating to wage schedules, the conditions of service, and of hours, those agreements for the term covered must be sedulously kept by the ones who sign that agreement.

With these matters, Mr. President, there ought not to be any question. There ought to be no legitimate controversy about them. Simply because certain Senators here thought that a labor union and a farmers' organization ought not to be prosecuted because they violated the antitrust law induced Mr. Gompers to seek to destroy everyone who did not take his orders on that subject. No farmers have blacklisted those who refused to obey Mr. Gompers.

That is where this immediate controversy began. It existed before the occasion referred to. It is an ancient dispute. It will never be settled, Mr. President, until it is settled right. It will be that there are no favored ones before the law. You may postpone the day, you may hesitate, you may evade, you may legislate, you may create acts of Congress, but ultimately it all returns to the same thing. You can not lawfully create classes. You can not punish some and exempt others, until at last there grows up a series of acts which are noncriminal when committed by some and criminal when committed by you and me, Mr. President. That can not endure in this country any more than the country could endure half slave and half free more than half a century ago.

The vital question in this country is that of lawlessness of the kind Mr. Gompers minimizes or condones, and on that I know no favorites. I know nothing except that when it comes to destroying property, to assaulting and beating peaceable citizens engaged in their legitimate occupations, and pursuing them in a lawful manner, to willful, cold-blooded, cruel murder, I know but one rule, and that is to prosecute and punish, to imprison, and to convict and execute those who break the law of the particular jurisdiction where the act is committed.

Let me say this to everybody, those who work with hands or minds, those in a union or out of a union, let me say to the American people that this is one of the supreme issues, not of this campaign, because it is nonpolitical, but the paramount issue for the American people to settle if our rights shall be preserved as they came to us from our ancestors of old. On that I have no politics. I would as soon vote for a Democrat on that question as anybody else. I have fixed beliefs on that subject, but I have no politics. I shall act in accordance with my understanding of the law of the country and the proper way in which civil society can be preserved.

Why, only a few weeks ago, Mr. President, in the city of Chicago a number of men were convicted of smashing plate glass all over the city. It was an organized conspiracy of the glaziers and joiners and certain branches of the metal workers' trade. What were they doing it for? For a double purpose. One was, the evidence showed pretty conclusively, they were hired by the venders and distributers. The other was that certain of the jobs were done by nonunion labor. They are now in jail for one year. They were convicted. The judge was threatened who tried the case; witnesses were threatened; a dynamite shell was set off by the house of an important witness to frighten him into silence or flight.

Have I heard Mr. Gompers raise his voice denouncing any of those gentlemen? Not once. Have I heard Mr. Gompers's voice at any time denouncing any of the numerous acts af violence that occurred by these men? Not once. Have I heard his voice at any time before the McNamaras were convicted? I have heard this. I beg to read this, dated July 27, 1911, because some letters have been placed in the RECORD, and I will be very glad now to complete that record and place one of Mr. Gompers's letters in the RECORD:

From Los Angeles last October came the news that a terrible catastrophe had occurred in that city; that the Los Angeles Times Building has been destroyed, with the loss of a number of lives. The first word spoken, even before the flames had completed their destruction, by the emissaries of the Times contained positive declarations that organized labor was responsible for the disaster. Qualifying statements were conspicuous by their absence. Wide publicity was given; warped and unsupported allegations against the organized workmen of the entire country were featured. Vast sums of money were dangled in the faces of unscrupulous men to fasten the crime upon some member or members of the trades unions. The National Manufacturers' Association, backed by the Erectors' Association, citizens' alliances, detective agencies, and a hostile press brought their every influence to bear and appropriated every available circumstance to bulwark and fix in the public mind a mental attitude that the charges against organized labor had been proven beyond the peradventure of a doubt.

This is Mr. Gompers's letter:

The authors of the charge, after months of intrigue and searching investigations, utterly failed to substantiate the flambuoyant and positive accusations that had been made. The public mind was slowly emerging from the hypnotic spell in which it had been developed, and mutterings of suspicion began to be heard against the originators of the indictments against labor men. The position of the hostile employers' association became exceedingly desperate. The Times management, with its years of relentless warfare against humanity, fearing that its Belshazzar feast of organized labor's blood was about to be denied, redoubled its efforts and demanded that a sacrifice must be furnished that its unholy appetite might be appeased, specifying that some union workman or workmen must be supplied to assuage its unnatural and abnormal hunger.

The record of events is too well known to make it necessary to recount them in detail. That "the end justifies the means" became the slogan is patent. With all the forces of greed compactly joined there began a campaign of vandalism the like of which has never before found lodgment on the pages of our American Republic's history. A prominent member of union labor was selected, J. J. McNamara, and one at whom—and one at whom the finger of suspicion had never before pointed, whose life had been characterized by an uprightness of purpose and loyalty to the cause of labor, and whose activities in every walk had drawn to him the commendation of his fellows. To give the stage the proper setting and to involve other trades than the ironworkers, J. B. McNamara, the brother, was selected for the sacrifice.

With intrigue, falsehood, and an utter disregard for all forms of law, applying individual force, conniving with faithless officials, the two McNamaras were rushed in feverish haste to the scene of the alleged crime. The rights of these two men have been trampled upon willfully, flagrantly, and wantonly.

Every man, even the meanest, under the constitutional guaranties of our country is entitled to a trial by a jury of his peers, and every man is presumed to be innocent until proven guilty. Thus far the proceedings have been outside the pale of those guaranties. The charge has been lodged against organized labor, and two of its members are now before the bar to answer these charges. What is the duty of the organized-labor movement? What shall be our course? What effort shall we put forth to see to it that justice shall finally obtain?

The intellect, heart, and soul of the men of labor yield to no body or class of citizens in their fidelity in obedience to the law, and their history is replete with instances of sacrifice that humanity may be protected. If within the ranks of labor there are those who permit infractions of the law, then they should be punished, but there should not be instituted a double standard of justice—one for the wealthy malefactor and another for the workman.

The organized-labor movement believes that the McNamaras are innocent. Upon that belief there devolves upon us another duty. The accused men are workmen, without means of their own to provide a proper defense. The assault is made against organized labor equally with the McNamaras.

That is what this letter says. My criticism of Gompers he says is a criticism of the American Federation of Labor. You will notice the perverse ingenuity of the man in immediately dodging the necessary consequences of his own act and insisting that it is the cause of organized labor that is assaulted every time a criminal is prosecuted, every time a murderer is brought to book.

What would you think if every time a banker was indicted for a violation of the banking act the Pennsylvania State Bankers' Association would convene itself or, through its president and secretary, would call upon all the bankers of Pennsylvania to raise funds to defend an embezzler? What would be thought if a lawyer committed embezzlement or a murder and the American Bar Association, the bar association of his own State, should convene and pass resolutions declaring their belief in the defendant's innocence, denouncing the complaining witnesses, asking for a subscription to be made by members of the American bar or by the American bankers of the State or country to raise funds to defend a banker or lawyer who was charged with crime?

What would be thought if, in the resolution, it went further and said all the lawyers of the country are attacked, the bar is assailed, the bankers are assailed, when one of their members or more are charged with a violation of the criminal code?

There is as much reason in the one case as in the other. I shall not let my sympathies, sympathies that rise naturally in every mind and every heart for the man who works with his hands and who possesses but little means to defend himself, overbalance the sense of justice without which the country and civil society can not endure. I continue:

If we are true to the obligations we have assumed, if it is hoped to forever settle this system of malicious prosecution of the men of labor, our duty is plain.

Funds must be provided to insure a fair and impartial trial. Eminent counsel has been engaged. Arrangements are proceeding that a proper defense may be made. The great need of the hour is money with which to meet the heavy drain incident to the collection of evidence and other necessary expense.

Every man who was connected with the kidnaping of the McNamaras will be prosecuted to the full limit of the law. It is proposed that the interests of organized labor shall be fully protected and punishment meted out to detective agencies that assume to be superior to the law. The rights of the men of labor must, shall be, preserved.

The men of labor, unlike the hostile organizations arrayed against us, have not vast sums of wealth to call upon, but they are imbued with the spirit of justice and are ever ready to make sacrifice for principle.

The trial of the McNamaras is set to commence on October 11. In the name of justice and humanity all members of our organizations are urgently requested to contribute as liberally as their ability will permit. All contributions toward the legal defense of the McNamara cases and for the prosecution of the kidnapers should be transmitted as soon as collected to Frank Morrison, 801–809 G Street NW., Washington, D. C.—

The letter which was read by the Senator from Missouri is on the same letterhead, 801–809 G Street NW., Washington, D. C.—

who will forward a receipt for every contribution received by him, and after the trial a printed copy of the contributions received, together with the expense incurred, will be mailed to each contributor.

Fraternally,

SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

Attest.

FRANK MORRISON,
Secretary.

In pursuance of this circular, believing its representations, organized labor largely connected with the national structural iron workers possibly more than the affiliated federation, contributed $190,000. That was raised and put in the hands of a Chicago lawyer with instructions to defend the McNamaras whom this letter says represented the cause of organized labor in the courts of California.

I denounce that groundless assertion as the basest libel against the laboring men of this country. The McNamaras did not, and heaven save the mark, could not represent organized labor.

I know men, with whom I have been associated with since earliest boyhood, are in organized labor of every nationality, of every creed, from all over Europe they or their ancestors came. They are in every occupation. Looking out of the cab of a locomotive which runs out of Chicago there are many whom I knew in their early days. I fished with some of them along the branches of the Wabash River. I have lived with them all—Protestant and Catholic, Gentile and Jew. I know them in their affiliations, trades, and occupations wherever found. I denounce again as the basest libel upon these men and the law-abiding workingmen of America that the McNamaras represented them in their bloody deeds.

Divorce yourselves now and for all time from the men who prostitute your cause; who would pour into your ears the doctrine that you can rise superior to the laws of civil society; that you can survive by lawlessness and crime; that a reign of terror may be instituted, and that you can live through it all and emerge victors in deeds of violence to vindicate your rights. Turn no willing ear to such talk. Who suggests it is your enemy, not your friend. It has been tried before your generation and mine; it has been tried from ancient days. It has been tried in the earliest dawn of history when Herodotus wrote, when Josephus recited the history of the Hebrews and the Antiquities of the Jews.

You can not escape the solemn experience of mankind; you can not do violence to the immutable principles on which governments rest and the peace of society depends by following such men as Gompers, who defends the McNamaras, who has never yet apologized, except in this letter—a weak and inefficient apology, as it is, too—who has never apologized other than by writing such a letter and committing, or seeking to commit, the righteous cause of union labor in this Republic to the guidance of such men, and stamping it with the bloody brand of murder and violence throughout our country.

May a beneficent Providence forgive such men; but you, my union-labor friends, whether I know you or not, listen to my voice this afternoon. I will end as I began. I said that in April, 1913, that I might serve out the 23 months, that they would soon circle away into eternity, but I preferred never to hold public office here or elsewhere if I must do so by the surrender of what I think is of more importance than political parties or public office—the right to pursue uninfluenced a course of conduct dictated by conscience and make laws for all and not for a few.

I am talking now not to the Senators. I am talking to the organized labor of the country. Obey the law; ask for legislation; be fair in your dealings; give to others the same liberty of thought you claim for yourselves; avoid crime and those who would counsel or commit you to crime. There is no preservation for you or for me, other than the preservation of peace and total abstention from violence.

One hundred and ninety thousand dollars were sent to California. That sum was put at the time in the possession of Clarence Darrow, who is what we commonly call a "labor lawyer," a very good lawyer, and a pleasant gentleman. I served with Mr. Darrow in the legislature of Illinois in my early days. Mr. Darrow went out and rendered service, as he had in other cases of a like kind. He encountered some obstacles of his own in that State. He himself, it so fell out, was indicted upon a charge on which he was acquitted; but, at least, there was no further difficulty in the trial of the McNamara brothers, charged with murder, for whom Mr. Gompers, by this circular, raised $190,000 to defend as he alleges innocent victims of the vicious capitalistic element of this country.

About the time that Mr. Gompers was getting ready to deliver further maledictions upon the capitalists and the capitalistic press of this country, the McNamaras pleaded guilty. They did not plead guilty in order that they might be a vicarious atonement for somebody else, but they pleaded guilty because their bloody trails had been uncovered; all the way from Cincinnati, from Indianapolis, from Portland, Ind., where they got the dynamite, clear to Los Angles; then to Springfield, Ill., where they blew up an ironworker's job, to the bridge across the Illinois River at East Peoria, to the wrecking of the plant of A. Lucas & Sons, in Peoria, to the wrecking of another piece of work in Chicago—to 40 or 45 deliberate acts of destruction, reaching through several years, the connection and the responsibility of these men were trailed and fixed beyond the peradventure of any doubt. The pleas of guilty were dictated by prudence. If they had been tried by a California jury, if there had been capital punishment in that State, they would have been hanged.

Twenty-one innocent men and women, at 1 o'clock in the morning, in Los Angeles, were, in the twinkling of an eye, sent to eternity for no offense that they had committed, save that they were working in an honest occupation to earn a livelihood. Those are the men whom Mr. Gompers, as I said on the 15th of this month, tried in his self-constituted tribunal, found them not guilty, and denounced their prosecution as a crime against the cause of labor that he represented.

I again say that Mr. Gompers is a menace to the rights of legitimate labor; that Mr. Gompers is in a double sense a public nuisance. He is likewise a public peril. He is a peril to every honest union man in the United States; he is a peril to everyone outside the union who seeks to obey the laws of the land.

This letter is signed, Mr. President, by Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, and by Frank Morrison, secretary. From the headquarters of the International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers, at Cleveland, Ohio, under date of June 8, 1906, a letter was addressed to F. M. Ryan, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF BRIDGE AND STRUCTURAL IRON WORKERS,
Cleveland, Ohio, June 8, 1906.

Mr. F. M. RYAN,
Ashland House, New York City.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Inclosed you will find an appeal for financial aid received from Local Union No. 10 of Kansas City.

By referring to President Ryan's letter of the 7th instant, you can readily see our present financial standing and future prospects.

I have forwarded Brother Gerring, the secretary of Local Union No. 28, Richmond, Va., $100 to assist them in their struggle with the A. B. Co. and Erectors' Association.

Am inclosing you statements from Borden and Elsemore, two members of No. 17. The facts in brief are as follows:

Ex-President Buchanan authorized Brother McClory to do some missionary work in Toledo. McClory thought $150 would be sufficient and I issued him check for the amount. He secured four men. Among them were Borden and Elsemore. They went to Toledo and returned to Cleveland. Shortly after their return they were arrested for assault. We secured attorney and had jury trial. Jury disagreed, 11 for conviction and 1 for acquittal.

The remainder of this letter I will ask to insert in the RECORD, without reading. I only quote it to identify Mr. McNamara and his official position, not so much for its contents. It is signed by J. J. McNamara, secretary-treasurer—the same position he held at the time he was arrested and indicted. He was then secretary-treasurer of the structural ironworkers' organization.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES in the chair). Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from Illinois will be printed in the RECORD.

The remainder of the letter is as follows:

Our attorney stated that he was positive next trial would result in conviction and advised pleading guilty, with hope of securing parole before election, which was coming up. He also stated that if that was not satisfactory he would withdraw and we could get another attorney. He stated that he was positive that he could secure a parole within 10 days, and acting on his advice I assured the two men they would be recompensed for any time spent in jail. Men pleaded guilty and were sentenced to six months in jail. Attorney proceeded to get parole as promised, but about this time the Central Labor Union of Toledo adopted resolutions against two members of the board of public service, which board was composed of three men and had authority to grant paroles.

The question thus became a political issue, and there was nothing doing in the parole line. When the election rolled around in November the two members of the board of public service against whom the Central Labor Union had adopted resolutions were defeated, but their terms did not expire until January 1, 1906, and they absolutely refused to do anything relative to paroling Borden and Elsemore. When new members took office their authority to grant paroles was questioned and the case taken to court. It was not settled until the 1st of February. Borden and Elsemore were paroled after spending about five months in jail.

Elsemore received $321.30; Borden received $316.80.

They insisted on receiving more money, which I refused to give them, owing to the fact that we had all sorts of trouble and a very small income to handle it with. They seemed dissatisfied, and I told them to take it up with Ryan or executive board.

It was brought to Ryan's attention when he was at headquarters recently, and he refused to have anything to do with it other than to refer it to the board for an opinion. He stated to them that, in his opinion, when all things were considered, they had been very liberally treated by me.

The attorney fees for two trials amounted to something like $169.

Hoping to hear from you relative to the above propositions by return mail, I am,

Fraternally, yours,

J. J. MCNAMARA,
Secretary-Treasurer.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. I take it that the Senator has considerable to say yet, and I therefore embrace this occasion to advise the Senator that I announced when I took the floor that I was obliged to leave on the evening train. As I only have a few moments, I am compelled to leave, and I know the Senator will not understand that I am going out of any discourtesy to him. I certainly intend none.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand; and if the Senator wishes to leave, I shall make no personal allusion to him; that is not my purpose.

Mr. REED. That would be all right; but I wanted the Senator to understand that I was leaving because I was compelled to do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. Here are the undisputed matters of evidence showing the vigilance with which Mr. Gompers informs himself as to these people and their conduct, who are afterwards brought under suspicion, finally indicted, and pleaded guilty. This organization is one of the affiliated organizations with the American Federation of Labor. The evidence shows that more than $1,000 a month was drawn from the treasury of the organization at Indianapolis and paid to the McNamaras. This was their working fund; it was called a "fund for educational purposes." It is like the one in Chicago, where sluggers are paid out of the funds of the union. The law-abiding member knows nothing of this; it has no sanction from him. I am not saying this because I wish to do so; I am saying it because somebody has got to say it, because some union man at some time will have courage enough himself to say it, because many of them at some time will rise in their just indignation and demand that such use of their funds and such perversion of their organization shall cease.

A thousand dollars a month was drawn for several years. It was used to dynamite the places that I have mentioned and others. One of my neighbors in Springfield spent 18 months in the penitentiary for such a crime. He was caught in the net of this widely spread criminal conspiracy that ended in murder. I never inclined to the belief that he actively engaged in any of the correspondence or deeds which he knew would result in the taking of life or even in the destruction of property. He wrote letters under the command of his superior officer in the organization, addressed to certain delegates, "to go unionize a job." That was the expression used.

He testified he did not know that "unionize" meant anything more than the ordinary method of bringing all the workmen into the Structural Iron Workers' Union. It turned out later that to unionize, in that series of letters, in the circumstances, meant to dynamite the job. So he suffered for being found in bad company under suspicious circumstances. He was drawn into the net and convicted with the rest of the defendants at Indianapolis.

With all of these men in this widespread conspiracy, with large sums of money drawn out of the treasury, with one of the most important federations, with a few officers with great power in their hands, collecting money from the law-abiding members of the organization, Mr. Gompers went innocently, serenely on his way, without knowledge of what was done with the money or how the men who handled it behaved. In any ordinary affair it would be criminal negligence not to know.

Here is a significant thing. I call upon Mr. Gompers to answer it. I advert to it so that every honest union man in this Republic may treasure it in his memory and bring his understanding to bear upon it. Has there been a job of structural ironwork dynamited in the United States since the McNamaras were convicted and the Indianapolis dynamiters sent to Fort Leavenworth? Not a case of dynamiting has afflicted this country, destroyed property, or taken life since that sentence was imposed upon those men.

It is true that the men tried at Indianapolis were not convicted of murder, nor were they tried for murder nor for the unlawful destruction of property. They were tried on the charge of unlawfully transporting dynamite contrary to the interstate-commerce law. Under that they were convicted and are now serving the terms imposed upon them in the sentence pronounced upon them at the end of their trial.

No one doubts for a moment what the purposes were in the transportation of this dynamite. No man for an instant doubts that every pound of this dynamite that was transported by these defendants or through their agency with the money paid by the checks drawn and paid to the McNamaras and others was for criminal purposes. The operations of McManigal, the operations of Herbert S. Hockins, the operations of those men who were linked together by the evidence until an Indiana jury hesitated a very short time comparatively, the length of the evidence and the duration of the trial considered, resulted in finding them guilty. Does anyone doubt what was done with the dynamite and what was intended to be done with it? No sane man doubts it. It was intended to be used for lawless purposes, and it was so used. Mr. Gompers, in his letter, says:

> The only inference of your attack, therefore, is not upon me personally or officially, but upon the policy, principles, and activity of the American Federation of Labor and the whole body of wage earners who have been and are striving in an American fashion and lawful manner to secure a better standard of life and equal rights and concepts of these rights with every other citizen of our Republic.

Mr. Gompers, in making that statement, knows better. Mr. Gompers, in making that statement, utterly perverts or departs from the point at issue. Mr. Gompers knows that I did not attack, nor have any of my friends ever attacked, the American Federation of Labor or the cause of labor at all. When he says that the attack is upon the organization of which he is the head he is no more correct than when, in this circular, he said that an attack upon the McNamaras and their arrest and prosecution was an attack upon the union labor of the country.

Any union-labor man, however radical he may be, would to-day resent what Mr. Gompers says in his letter that I will have incorporated in the RECORD. He would resent it as an infamous charge against the body with which he is affiliated, and he would be right when he resented it.

Why did not Mr. Gompers inform himself during all these years while these acts were being committed? If it be thought that Mr. Gompers has any duty in connection with the head of that organization, how did it happen that Mr. Gompers could permit one violent act after another? Ought not his duty go that far? Dynamite on the Pacific coast, dynamite in the Mississippi Valley, dynamite at Cleveland, dynamite at Buffalo, dynamite almost from coast to coast, and still Mr. Gompers did not know that a solitary union man, in the person of the McNamaras or their associates, had a thing in the world to do with it.

If I were at the head of an organization as its chief officer, and one of the principal bodies affiliated with that organization was doing what the Indianapolis defendants did and what the McNamaras did, and I did not know it, I ought to be indicted for dense and inexcusable ignorance of things I ought to know—not indicted criminally, but indicted before the tribunal of reasonable men's mind.

All these years this happened. Men were suddenly blown into eternity. Millions of dollars of property were destroyed. Mr. Gompers went placidly on his way. The bloody trail in a great tragedy was unseen by this vigilant guardian. No word of rebuke came from him. He did not know it. He says he believed the McNamaras were innocent. I presume, because he has never apologized, he believes these men convicted in Indianapolis were innocent. He never has apologized for his views on either question.

He is ready at any time to defend anybody else who claims he is a member of a union, however infamous may be the crime with which he is charged, and which afterwards may be proven against him.

Mr. Gompers never apologizes. Mr. Gompers says nothing. As soon as the ordinary penal machinery that restrains desperate characters from the commission of crimes against life and property is put in motion, and a union man is arrested charged with these offenses, Mr. Gompers flies to the rescue, collects money, employs lawyers, denounces courts, inveighs against the "capitalistic press," abuses everybody connected with the law-and-order processes of courts and civil society; and when these unfortunate, deluded men are convicted no word of explanation comes from Mr. Gompers's lips.

I repeat, Mr. President, Mr. Gompers is not a good American citizen. There is not a boy on his way to mature years in this country that ought to set up the standard that Mr. Gompers follows to be his guide and mentor in the days of his manhood. Mr. Gompers is a disgrace to organized labor. Mr. Gompers is a menace to civil society. Mr. Gompers is an apologist for criminals. Mr. Gompers is an associate and boon companion of men whose hands are reddened with the blood of their fellow men. Mr. Gompers, and such as he, would overturn civil society. We would return to aboriginal force. We would lapse to the rule of violence, when not justice but the strong hand ruled.

Mr. Gompers in his letter prates of "justice" and of "humanity." What does he know of justice? The victims whose pulseless clay is slumbering on the Pacific coast, the victims who are sleeping in their graves in Chicago, some who are living to-day maimed and mangled for life are the witnesses and the names of others carved on their monuments the pathetic reminiscences of Mr. Gompers's code of justice in America.

I will have just as many union-labor votes, if I ever run for office in my country, after I have said what I have as I ever had before. If any member of an organized union thinks he ought not to vote for me, he can vote some other ticket. If any member of any organized union thinks he can advance his cause by such methods as the McNamaras used, as Ryan used, as Hockins used, I do not want the vote of that union member. If I can not be elected by law-abiding men, in the union or out of it, I never want to hold another public office while I live. I will look you union men in the face. I have done it before.

I went into the wards of my home city within a few hundred feet of the heaps of ashes where a riotous mob for two days and nights had burned and murdered. I was a candidate for office. I went into the toughest places, into the halls above saloons, and looked in the faces of the crowds there with scars on their visages, with ears chewed off in former combats, with the marks of dissipation and crime on their faces; because that city is the half-way point between St. Louis and Chicago and a convenient rendezvous for that type of men. I said, "Do not any of you men vote for me under the impression that if I am in authority I will permit you to riot and burn and murder in Springfield two days and nights again. I will get the National Guard; you will have fair warning, and if you do not disperse and go to your rendezvous and homes after about one round of blank cartridges, the rest of the rounds will have bullets; and I propose, if I am in authority, to order the men to shoot to kill you men if you do not behave yourselves." I got more votes in those precincts than I was entitled to. I ran ahead of my ticket in the toughest wards in the town because I looked in the faces of the men and told them what I thought and what I would do.

I am saying the same thing now—that if you believe in such criminal conduct, and if you believe that human society can be kept together in that way, I do not want your votes. I do not want you to vote for my friends. I want my constituents who support me to be law-abiding men. I do not care what other ticket they vote, but I want them to vote a ticket that is consonant with the law and the peaceable usages of civilized society.

Mr. President, I think I have said possibly more than I should have said, in view of the time that I have taken; but I shall not place any more documents in the RECORD at the present time. I have a great many of them. I only wish to say, in conclusion, that so far as Mr. Gompers is concerned I will take care of myself at whatever time and place and season seems to me to be necessary. I began my criticism here in the Senate. I will conclude it in the Senate, either now or hereafter, as circumstances may require. Politically, I have no quarrel with Mr. Gompers. I have no quarrel with anybody, because in what I am talking about there is no politics. If anybody favors Mr. Gompers's creed, his indefensible conduct, his inexcusable indifference to crime, and the creed of those whom he defends and apologizes for, if he were on my ticket I would not vote for him, because there is the graver question that law-abiding citizens must unite, without regard to creed and race or politics, if we shall preserve the law of the land and the institutional government we attained by the sacrifice of our fathers.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I think it is unfortunate for the peace and composure of the Senate that a distinguished citizen of the United States [Mr. Gompers] should be subjected to such a drastic attack as has been indulged by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], and more particularly when that citizen has been for many years repeatedly chosen as the trusted leader of nearly two millions of the working people of the United States, representing approximately ten millions of people—nearly twice as many people as reside in the great State the Senator represents. More unfortunate yet is it when the Senator on the Senate floor calls upon Mr. Gompers and defiantly challenges him "to answer like a man":

Gird up your loins, Mr. Gompers, and answer me like a man. I will teach him [Gompers] a few degrees of active, practical, civic decency in my country that he does not know of if he will only come out and give the people a chance.

Now, when Mr. Gompers offers to come out and give the people a chance, the Senator from Illinois imposes a condition that as a preliminary Mr. Gompers must be elected a Senator of the United States. I suppose, if Mr. Gompers wanted to pursue that amiable method of warfare, he would impose the further condition that the Senator from Illinois should be elected president of the American Federation of Labor as a necessary preliminary to this forensic combat.

The American people will not be entertained very soon by this debate which the Senator first invites and then evades by imposing impossible conditions as a prerequisite. Let us have peace.

There is one thing to which I think it is proper to call the attention of the Senate, and that is that the American Federation of Labor is governed by a particular system under which they take a referendum vote on questions affecting their policy, by which they have an initiative in which members and lodges may initiate proposals to be submitted to their people. For that reason the American Federation of Labor is in fact as well as in theory a self-governing body.

No man and none of its officers has any authority to deliver, and no man can deliver, the vote of the members of the American Federation of Labor, and to charge Gompers with the purpose or the attempt is preposterous.

The Senator from Illinois is entirely safe in denouncing those invisible and negligible members of the American Federation of Labor who are alleged to believe in murder and arson, dynamite and burglary. They are not very numerous, if they exist at all. They are quite negligible, and can be denounced with perfect impunity. The Senator is within his rights and perfectly safe in denouncing all the murderers and dynamiters, members of the American Federation of Labor, with all the enthusiasm which his convenience may seem to demand.

But Mr. Gompers, notwithstanding the denunciation of the Senator from Illinois, is a faithful, honorable citizen of the highest character. He is a man whom I have known for many years. I have a great respect for him. I believe he is a thoroughly honest man. I believe he loves justice and mercy and righteousness. Let Mr. Gompers speak for himself as far as the unjust charge of narrow partisanship is concerned.

I have in my hand a declaration from Samuel Gompers in the July number of the American Federationist, headed "Promises and Performances," in which he deals with political parties in language so sincere, so modest, and so just that not even the most violent partisan can justly criticize it. After he has stated what the demands of labor have been in their appeals to the Republican Party, to the Progressive Party, and to the Democratic Party, and after he has quoted what their answers are in their several national platforms—matters which ought to be made known to the members of the American Federation of Labor—he then makes this temperate observation:

Thus, the workers have before them the platform declarations of the Republican, Democratic, and Progressive Parties upon the subjects which most directly affect them. Now, the workers must make up their minds as to which of these political parties is most likely, if intrusted with power, to carry their declarations into effect, and as to the adequacy of the response which each party made to labor's demands. For 30 years wage earners had vainly endeavored to secure the amendment of the Sherman antitrust law, so as to place voluntary organizations of toilers outside the pale of antitrust legislation that they should not be regarded in the same category as trusts and organizations organized for profit.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator will excuse me, I am going to occupy only about 10 minutes, then I will answer any question he would like to ask me.

For 30 years organized labor has been vainly knocking at the door of Congress to secure relief from the injunction abuse and to have restored the right of trial by jury in contempt cases. For 30 years the workers of America had vainly asked Congress to relieve the seamen from the position of bondsmen, and all this occurred under the domination of Congress and the Presidency by the Republican Party.

The Democratic Congress passed and on October 15, 1914, President Wilson signed the Clayton antitrust law. Among its provisions was the declaration that the labor of a human being is not a commodity or an article of commerce. It freed the voluntary organizations of labor from the antitrust law and under which Attorney General Wickersham said no suit, such as the Hatters' case, could now be maintained in the Federal courts. Relief from the abuse of the injunctive writ was secured and trial by jury in contempt cases restored. The Democratic Congress passed the seamen's act, and on March 4, 1915, President Wilson signed the act.

With the workers it is not a question of partisan politics. As the great conference in 1906 declared, the organized-labor movement is not partisan to a political party, but partisan to a principle, and that principle for justice, freedom, and humanity. As the campaign shall proceed it may be necessary to further elucidate the questions in the coming election of both Houses of Congress, as well as the President and Vice President. The liberty-loving citizens of our country will do their own thinking and act accordingly. They will vote as their judgment, their conscience, their patriotism, and their own interests and welfare, as well as the welfare of the people of the United States will direct.

Is this leader of the organized labor unions of the country addressing his associates in this temperate language to be denounced as a bitter partisan or as an advocate of a political party from a partisan standpoint?

The record of the Democratic administration and Congress, favorable to labor is amazing and not half understood by the country. I submit a few of these items to the record, not including the present session, with its notable accomplishments fresh in your minds, such as the rural-credits act, the child-labor act, the ship-purchase act, the Government-owned nitrate plant, armor-plate plant, and so forth.

Special congressional investigation of industrial disputes in the Colorado coal fields and the Michigan copper region, wherein all of the complaints and charges made by the men of labor against the mining companies and the alliance of these companies with the political and military powers of the States were officially verified and substantiated.

28. An additional annual appropriation of $240,000 for the years 1914–15 was provided for the pay roll of the metal trades mechanics employed at the Washington, D. C., Navy Yard. This was equivalent to a 7.81 per cent increase in wages.

29. The statutory enactment of an income tax in conformity with the recent United States constitutional amendment.

30. An additional appropriation of $139,000 for the work of the Children's Bureau.

31. More adequate appropriations for the Department of Labor to carry on its work.

32. Senate resolution demanding information from Cabinet officials as to what uses, if any, were made of Rockefeller or Carnegie funds in their departments.

33. Prevented a reduction in wages and installation and collection of rents for employees on the Panama Canal Zone.

34. Immigration bill providing for the literacy test, passed by Congress and vetoed by the President.

I ask the privilege of putting in Mr. Gompers's modest letter in its entirety without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PROMISES AND PERFORMANCES.

[By Samuel Gompers.]

There has been a force in American politics that has insistently and steadily presented the human side and the human relations of all questions. This force has made itself felt with increasing vigor during recent years. The results of its work are demonstrated in the clarification of political issues, in the greater consideration that has been given to human rights in legislation and administration, and in the more general representation that has been given to human interest in all departments of government.

When the American Federation of Labor inaugurated its new policy for nonpartisan political use of labor's political power in 1906 the power of corporate wealth seeemed intrenched behind impregnable control over the Government. But labor has brought a change in the attitude of Government representatives toward its demands and in the kind and number of laws enacted in the interest of workers.

When the representatives of the American Federation of Labor in 1906 presented labor's bill of grievances to those in responsible positions in the legislative and executive branches of the Federal Government they presented 10 demands. Since that presentation all but two of these original demands have been enacted into law, in addition to the long list of humanitarian legislation recently set forth in the pamphlet issued by the American Federation of Labor entitled "Labor's Legislative Achievements." Labor stands for a broad interpretation of the purposes and methods of government that they may make for freedom, equal justice, and serve the interests of humanity.

The political principles and legislative demands which labor now urges upon the Congress of the United States were in accord with the instructions of the conventions of the American Federation of Labor presented to the platform committees of the various political parties. This thought was urged upon the representatives of those parties, that the time is past when it can longer be questioned that human rights and human welfare are of paramount importance to all the Nation. The future of any political party depends upon what it will undertake to do for the masses of the people.

With the recognition of this principle, we have entered upon a period when there must be competition between the political parties as to which can do most for the citizens of the Nation. The demands which were presented to the platform committees of the Republican and Progressive Parties which met in Chicago were as follows:

"Government and all civilization exist for the service of human beings and the promotion of their betterment. Such purposes are best achieved when those who are primarily affected by policies and methods have the power of determining them. Under such conditions only will there be relations of good will between fellow citizens and a spirit of true patriotism essential to the best development and unity of our Nation. There must be reason for the conviction that citizens can rely upon the Government for impartial maintenance of rights and protection. Such an attitude can result only when principles of human welfare are made paramount to any other consideration. Experience of other countries and scientific information substantiate the contention that sweated industries, overstrain, long and burdensome hours of toil, tend to physical deterioration, loss of mental virility, and consequent decreased producing power. Standards of life and work, daily hours of toil and wages, have a direct relation to economic progress and development as well as to preparedness for national defense.

"We pledge our party to maintain the Federal law enacted by Congress securing to the workers the legal right of voluntary association, for mutual protection and welfare, protecting their rights against unwarrantable issuance of writs of injunction, and guaranteeing the right of trial by jury in alleged contempt cases committed outside the presence of courts.

"National preparedness, as well as commercial development, in keeping with the importance and the dignity of our Nation, require that we shall have competent and able American seamen. We urge as essential to this purpose the vigorous enforcement of the seamen's act and the most liberal interpretation of its provisions. We are opposed to any minimizing of present provisions for the protection of seamen and for the safety of the traveling public. It is essential to National safety, as well as to the maintenance of an American merchant marine, that conditions of work for seamen shall be such as shall induce resourceful, capable, liberty-loving Americans to follow that vocation. Such American seamen will constitute a trained reserve force in times of national peril.

"In order to protect the wages of our workingmen and their standards of living against the dangerous competition of low-priced labor, which will be largely increased at the close of the European war by the migration of such labor to this country, we demand that the immigration and contract-labor laws be thoroughly enforced and so extended as to exclude from entrance to the United States all persons who can not read some language.

"The fundamental step in national preparedness for development and growth as well as for defense is education that will develop the power and faculties of all citizens and will enable each to take advantage of opportunities for life and work. We demand that there shall be provisions for industrial education and vocational training in addition to cultural education. National industrial efficiency is not a haphazard occurrence, but is the result of carefully considered methods and policies. The initial requisite for any policy to further industrial efficiency is liberal appropriations for necessary education. As this is a matter of national concern, we demand the early enactment of a law providing for adequate assistance to public educational institutions in the various States, which shall provide for industrial education and vocational training in accord with Federal provisions and standards.

"We demand the enactment and rigid enforcement of a Federal child-labor law which shall give adequate protection to the child life of the Nation.

"We demand the faithful observance and enforcement of all the Federal eight-hour laws and their extension to comprehend all departments of Government.

"We urge the enactment of a law by Congress for a comprehensive and generous workmen's compensation act.

"We demand the enactment of legislation excluding from interstate commerce the products of convict labor.

"We demand legislation that will abolish present preventable and appalling loss of life and maiming of human beings in American industry and transportation. We favor the creation and maintenance of a bureau of safety under the Department of Labor, which shall be authorized and directed to collect and collate data dealing with industrial hazards and to devise and recommend to Congress any further legislation necessary for securing safety and conservation of human labor power, as well as to formulate and put into operation methods whereby adequate protection shall be afforded to workers from the hazards of industry and transportation.

"Under the euphonious and misleading term "scientific management" and systems of time study and stop watches many have been deceived. Any system which ignores principles of human welfare disregards consideration of fatigue and the effects of highly specialized methods of production which subdivide mechanical and other operations into such units that the individual tasks become machine-like and injurious to mind and body can not be countenanced. These systems not only have injurious effect upon the lives—the physical and mental well-being of our workers—but curb the development of skill among the toilers of America. We therefore demand that all adaptations of speeding-up systems shall be forbidden in all work in which the Government is concerned.

"For the safety and the protection of the workers of America we declare for the extension of the powers and functions of the Federal Bureau of Mines.

"We pledge our party to the enactment of a law bestowing upon the people of Porto Rico the full right of American citizenship.

"We favor adequate compensation for all employees in the civil service and legislation establishing a reasonable minimum wage for all such employees.

"We favor the creation of a tribunal to which all employees in the competitive civil service may appeal for redress of grievances.

"We favor the enactment of a comprehesive Federal compensation law to apply to all civil-service employees.

"We favor and pledge our support to secure the enactment of an equitable retirement law providing for the retirement of superannuated and disabled employees of the civil service.

"We assert that the acceptance of employment in the civil service of our Government must in no case impair the employees' right of petition.

"We favor Government ownership of telegraphs and telephones.

"We favor the absolute suffrage of women coequal with men.

The platform of the Republican Party contains the following planks of interest to labor:

"The civil-service law has always been sustained by the Republican Party, and we renew our repeated declaration that it shall be thoroughly and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable.

"We pledge the Republican Party to the faithful enforcement of all Federal laws passed for the protection of labor. We favor vocational education; the enactment and rigid enforcement of a Federal child-labor law; the enactment of a generous and comprehensive workmen's compensation law, within the commerce power of Congress, and an accident compensation law covering all Government employees. We favor the collection and collation, under the direction of the Department of Labor, of complete data relating to industrial hazards for the information of Congress, to the end that such legislation may be adopted as may be calculated to secure the safety, conservation, and protection of labor from the dangers incident to industry and transportation.

"The Republican Party, reaffirming its faith of government of the people, by the people, for the people, as a measure of justice to one-half the adult people of this country, favors the extension of the suffrage to women, but recognizing the right of each State to settle this question for itself."

The Progressive platform contains the following response to labor's demands:

"A nation to survive must stand for the principles of social and industrial justice. We have no right to expect continued loyalty from an oppressed class. We must remove the artificial causes of the high cost of living, prevent the exploitation of men, women, and children in industry by the extension of the workmen's compensation law to the full limit permitted under the Constitution, and, by a thoroughgoing child-labor law, protect the wage earner; and by a properly regulated system of rural credits encourage the farmer and give to the landless man opportunity to acquire land.

"A country must be worth living in to be worth fighting for."

Labor's demands were presented to the Democratic Party which placed in its platform the following labor planks:

"We have lifted human labor from the category of commodities, and have secured to the workingman the right of voluntary association for his protection and welfare. We have protected the rights of the laborer against the unwarranted issuance of writs of injunction, and have guaranteed to him the right of trial by jury in cases of alleged contempt committed outside the presence of the court.

"We hold that the life, health, and strength of the men, women, and children of the Nation are its greatest asset, and that in the conservation of these the Federal Government, wherever it acts as the employer of labor, should both on its own account and as an example put into effect the following principles of just employment:

"1. A living wage for all employees.

"2. A working day not to exceed eight hours, with one day of rest in seven.

"3. The adoption of safety appliances and the establishment of thoroughly sanitary conditions of labor.

"4. Adequate compensation for industrial accidents.

"5. The standards of the 'uniform child-labor law,' wherever minors are employed.

"6. Such provisions for decency, comfort, and health in the employment of women as should be accorded the mothers of the race.

"7. An equitable retirement law providing for the retirement of superannuated and disabled employees of the civil service to the end that a higher standard of efficiency may be maintained.

"We believe also that the adoption of similar principles should be urged and applied in the legislation of the States with regard to labor within their borders, and that through every possible agency the life and health of the people of the Nation should be conserved.

"We declare our faith in the Seamen's Act, passed by the Democratic Congress, and we promise our earnest continuance of its enforcement.

"We favor the speedy enactment of an effective Federal child-labor law and the regulation of the shipment of prison-made goods in interstate commerce.

"We favor the creation of a Federal bureau of safety in the Department of Labor, to gather facts concerning industrial hazards, and to recommend legislation to prevent the maiming and killing of human beings.

"We favor the extension of the powers and functions of the Federal Bureau of Mines.

"We favor the development upon a systematic scale of the means adready begun under the present administration to assist laborers throughout the Nation to seek and obtain employement, and the extension by the Federal Government, by the same assistance and encouragement as is now given to agricultural training.

"We heartily commend our newly established Department of Labor for its excellent record in settling industrial strikes by personal advice and through conciliating agents.

"We recommend the extension of the franchise to the women of the country by the States upon the same terms as to men."

Thus, the workers have before them the platform declarations of the Republican, Democratic, and Progressive Parties upon the subjects which most directly affect them. Now, the workers must make up their minds as to which of these political parties is most likely, if entrusted with power, to carry their declarations into effect, and as to the adequacy of the response which each party made to labor's demands. For 30 years wage earners had vainly endeavored to secure the amendment of the Sherman antitrust law, so as to place voluntary organizations of toilers outside the pale of antitrust legislation that they should not be regarded in the same category as trusts and organizations organized for profit. For 30 years organized labor had been vainly knocking at the door of Congress to secure relief from the injunction abuse and to have restored the right of trial by jury in contempt cases. For 30 years the workers of America had vainly asked Congress to relieve the seamen from the position of bondmen, and all this occurred under the domination of Congress and the Presidency by the Republican Party.

The Democratic Congress passed, and on October 15, 1914, President Wilson signed the Clayton antitrust law. Among its provisions was the declaration that the labor of a human being is not a commodity or an article of commerce. It freed the voluntary organizations of labor from the antitrust law and under which Attorney General Wickersham said no suit, such as the hatters' case, could now be maintained in the Federal courts. Relief from the abuse of the injunctive writ was secured and trial by jury in contempt cases restored. The Democratic Congress passed the seamen's act, and on March 4, 1915, President Wilson signed the act.

With the workers it is not a question of partisan politics. As the great conference in 1906 declared, the organized labor movement is not partisan to a political party, but partisan to a principle, and that principle for justice, freedom, and humanity. As the campaign shall proceed, it may be necessary to further elucidate the questions in the coming election of both Houses of Congress, as well as the President and Vice President. The liberty-loving citizens of our country will do their own thinking and act accordingly. They will vote as their judgment, their conscience, their patriotism, and their own interests and welfare, as well as the welfare of the people of the United States will direct.

Mr. OWEN. Now, Mr. President, here is the declaration of a man who is the head of a great organization of labor, the greatest in the world. He merely lays the facts before his people. He leaves it to them to say what they will do in the coming election. He makes no partisan political appeal.

But I will say this, that after the experience of these organizations with 30 years of Republican rule in which they had appealed in vain time and time and time again for relief, if they now fail to show a fundamental and substantial appreciation of what the Democracy has done for them they will not deserve in future to be listened to by any political party on the ground that they are capable of gratitude or of respect for the performance of promises made them in national platforms.

Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from Illinois wants to ask me any questions I will be very pleased to answer him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to ask the Senator if he has any documentary evidence that Mr. Gompers ever denounced any member of the organization for crime after he had been convicted and sentenced.

Mr. OWEN. I know nothing about Mr. Gompers having denounced members who belonged to any of the labor-union organizations after they have been convicted of crime. I think, however, that Mr. Gompers is not called upon as the head of the American Federation of Labor to apologize to the country whenever any member of that organization is convicted of crime any more than the Senator from Illinois is called upon to apologize to the country whenever a person is convicted of murder in the State of Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have neither apologized for crime nor have I ever failed to denounce upon proper occasion the members of my profession who have committed crime that is peculiar to the profession, such as embezzlement and failure to account for funds. I have openly said a number of times that the profession must purge itself of such faithless members. I ask if Mr. Gompers has ever used his influence publicly so that we outsiders may know anything of the effort to keep his organization free from such persons as these defendants whom I have criticized?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have no doubt that Samuel Gompers and the vice presidents and officers of that organization have done whatever they could to keep their organization clean from criminals, because, as a matter of common sense, those men thoroughly understand, as any person of average intelligence understands, that to permit their organization to be controlled or to shelter criminals and murderers would be to disorganize and break the organization asunder and grind it to powder. The assumption that Samuel Gompers is willing to condone murder, I think, is absolutely outside of the record of any evidence in this country. I do not believe that he is unfaithful in any degree to his duties. I regard him as an upright man. I know him, and I know thousands of men who have known Gompers all their lives, and who trust him and believe in him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Gompers, so far as I know, has furnished no evidence of the good motives attributed to him by the Senator from Oklahoma, and I wish to inquire if the Senator knows of any such testimony?

Mr. OWEN. I sincerely attribute the highest motives and qualities to the Senator from Illinois, but I do not call upon him for further evidence of his good motives than an upright life and the confidence of those who know him best. Nor would I judge him by words spoken in anger or excitement or from resentment toward what he thought an injustice to himself.

Neither do I call for further evidence of Mr. Gompers's good motives than the overwhelming evidence I already have.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to state further that I have the very greatest confidence in the members of the various unions affiliated with the Federation of Labor. I do not have any confidence in Mr. Gompers or in his integrity or purpose in the guidance of that great organization.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator can not have any confidence in the judgment of organized labor in this country in denouncing as he does this man whom millions of members of the unions have trusted and whom they have elected over and over again. Have these organized labor people no common sense? Have they no judgment? Have they no evidence of the integrity and ability and worth of this man?

Mr. SHERMAN. There are many hundreds of thousands of unionized labor that are not affiliated even with the federation, and I know even in the federation the opinion of many good-standing and law-abiding members of Mr. Gompers.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator, of course, did not answer the point I made. He simply said there are some people not in that organization who do not trust him. There are 2,000,000 people in it who know him and who do trust him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am also referring to the people who are in organizations affiliated, whose opinion of Mr. Gompers is not much better than mine. I am entitled to my opinion. The Senator has his.

Mr. OWEN. Does the Senator regard that information from these various persons as to their opinion of Mr. Gompers as confidential, or is he willing to disclose it?

Mr. SHERMAN. With whom?

Mr. OWEN. Does the Senator regard the persons who distrust Mr. Gompers as a matter of confidential import, or is he willing to disclose to the country who they are?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will communicate with them, and if it will be any satisfaction to the Senator from Oklahoma I will give him their names, with their consent.

Mr. OWEN. Well, Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate on this matter. I only regret that any time of the Senate should be taken up at all in considering a matter of this kind, and I hope that in the future no citizen of the United States will be subjected to such an attack on the floor of the Senate as has been made this afternoon.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, does not the Senator think——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JAMES. Does not the Senator think it would have been more in keeping with the dignity of the Senate for the Senator from Illinois to have communicated with these gentlemen before he made this charge than to make the charge and then refuse to disclose his evidence, unless he has their consent? It seems to me that the Senate is not a proper place for a Senator representing a great Commonwealth to make broadside charges affecting the integrity and character of citizens of the Republic without being willing also to give his evidence. I do not think it is quite the right thing nor the proper place for the Senator to make the charge and then say, "I will sustain it, provided I can get the consent of the men who gave me the evidence."

PUBLICITY OF CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, before I yield the floor I desire to call the attention of the Senate to House bill 1542, a bill relating to the publicity of campaign contributions, and so forth, which has passed the House of Representatives, come over to the Senate, and been reported to the Senate. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is useless to ask unanimous consent now.

Mr. OWEN. That we may act upon this matter and vote upon it some day during the coming week.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows it is impossible to get a quorum here now; but if the Senator wants to try to drag Senators back here at 6.15 o'clock, he can do so.

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator objects, of course——

Mr. SMOOT. Of course I object, and the Senator knows why I object.

Mr. OWEN. In the presence of an objection, Mr. President, I will yield the floor.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. HUGHES. I present the conference report on House bill 16290 and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 16290) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 6, 14, 19, 24, 29, 30, and 38.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 28, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 40, 41, 42, and 43, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named insert "$30"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Transpose the matter inserted by said amendment to follow the word "Cavalry," in line 15, page 62, of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

WM. HUGHES,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

M. E. BURKE,
JNO. W. LANGLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the conference report? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I have listened to the debate this afternoon——

Mr. SMOOT. If that is the case, I am going to suggest the absence of a quorum, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah can not take the Senator from New Jersey off his feet to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HUGHES. I make the point of order that the Senator can not make the suggestion when I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken. What does the Senator from New Jersey wish to have done with the report?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not blame the Senator from Utah for trying to stop the discussion going on here.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. I am not trying to do so.

Mr. HUGHES. It is the most scandalous thing that has ever occurred in the Senate of the United States. A reputable citizen, a man who represents over two million people, has been abused here in terms that "one would have to go to a disorderly house," to use the expression of the Republican candidate for President, to find anything to equal it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I had no idea——

Mr. HUGHES. I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not yield to the Senator. The Senator sat here all afternoon in silence and listened to the abuse that was heaped upon the head of as honorable a man as he is and as honorable a man as sits in this Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not know——

Mr. HUGHES. I do not yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely desire to say that I did not know the Senator was going to speak on this subject. I thought he was going to endeavor to bring up a bill from the calendar; but I do not care whether or not he takes the remainder of the time this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah is out of order.

Mr. HUGHES. If the Senator does not care, then will the Senator subside and keep quiet? I am addressing my remarks to such of the Senators as are here. I am sorry that there are not more Republicans as well as more Democrats here to listen to the poor defense which I desire to make, in the minute or two which I intend to occupy, of a man whom I regard as truly representative of the most important class of people in this country, a man who has been abused in terms that are unworthy of the traditions of the United States Senate.

There never has been a man in all the world's history who has occupied the place that Mr. Gompers occupies who has not been abused in similar terms, abused by people who hypocritically hide behind their pretended affections for certain of his people, but who in their hearts have nothing but hatred and malignancy against any man who strikes a blow for humanity. The man who raises his voice in behalf of a child, the man who raises his voice in behalf of a woman, the man who raises his voice in favor of the weak and oppressed has been since the beginning of the world subjected to the same abuse which has been heaped here this afternoon upon this representative of the toilers of America.

You can turn to any period of the world's history and ascertain the truth of my assertion. When the agitation first began to put into use the commonest and crudest appliances for safety, when it was attempted by legislative enactments to shroud the yawning jaws of the cog wheels so that the arms and limbs of the children of the United States might not be fed into those industrial agencies, you will find that the men who sought to bring about such legislation, men like Gompers, who was the pioneer along that line, were denounced as anarchists, as men who desired to subvert the institutions of this country. They won that fight, and they have won thousands of other fights, and to-day hundreds of thousands of American citizens are enjoying life and are walking the broad earth in full possession of their limbs because of the activities of these men.

They have interfered with dividends. That is the sole crime; that is the only indictment that has been made against them. They have compelled the representatives of capital to safeguard their machinery. They have driven from the factories the tender children whose sinews were ground up into dividends. They have compelled the capitalists of the country to put their hands into their treasuries and place safety appliances upon freight cars and other instrumentalities of industrialism in this country.

It has cost money to save lives; it has cost money to save the limbs of the working people of this country, and to that extent these men and thousands like them have offended. And now, forsooth, because Mr. Gompers, an American citizen, thought it well to differ with the vote cast by the Senator from Illinois on a proposition which directly affected him, he is to be subjected to the abuse that has deafened our ears here this afternoon.

Talk about arraying class against class; talk about subversion of the institutions of this country, if a man can in this Chamber be held up to public scorn for exercising his rights as a citizen, what then becomes of the sacred right of every American citizen to vote for whom he pleases? What becomes of the sacred right of a man to exercise free speech?

Aye, Mr. President, what would become of the right of a Senator himself to exercise that right here which the Constitution gives him to be questioned in no other place, and what shall be said of a Member of this body who rises here and says on the floor of the Senate what he could not safely say in any other tribunal in this land?

Mr. Gompers needs no defense at my hands. I never laid my eyes on him until I came to the city of Washington; but I have watched his course; I have watched the course of those who have been collaborating with him, and I give it as my testimony that I have never seen him put his hand to a piece of proposed legislation that was not calculated to save the lives and the limbs and better the conditions of the working people of the United States of America.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What does the Senator from New Jersey wish done with regard to the conference report?

Mr. HUGHES. I asked unanimous consent that it be adopted——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent has been given.

Mr. HUGHES. And I thought the report had been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the conference report will be agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. What is the conference report?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to say, now that the Senator from New Jersey has subsided, since he would not yield to me, that I wanted to know, in the first place, what the matter was that he desired to bring up. I understood he had the calendar before him and had asked for the consideration of a bill, and therefore I objected. If we were going to take up a bill and were not going to adjourn, I wanted to get a quorum here.

Mr. HUGHES. I told the Senator what I was endeavoring to do.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator did not tell me that he wanted to speak on Mr. Gompers.

Mr. HUGHES. I told the Senator that I was offering a conference report which the Senator himself had signed.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection at all to the conference report being acted upon. I thought, of course, that it had been acted upon and that the Senator was proceeding here with another proposition. I have no objection.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask for the reading of the report. I want to know what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a pension bill.

Mr. GRONNA. I did not hear it, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was read. The Secretary will read it again.

The Secretary again read the conference report.

Mr. GRONNA. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5886) extending the time for the completion of the bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn., authorized by an act entitled "An act to amend an act approved July 20, 1912, entitled 'An act to authorize the Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River,' approved August 23, 1912," which were, on page 2, line 3, after "River,'" to insert two quotation marks; on page 2, line 4, after "twelve,'" to strike out two quotation marks; on page 2, line 6, after "seventeen," to insert: "Provided, That the wagon-way portion of said bridge and the approaches thereto shall be completed within said time"; on page 2, after line 6, to insert: "SEC. 2. Mr. SHEPPARD. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Is this a bridge bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is a bridge bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 17398) granting the consent of Congress to the ADJUDICATION OF PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6918) to relieve Congress from the adjudication of private claims against the Government, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. PENROSE, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill S. 1605, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, granting a pension to Fannie M. Carey, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

On motion of Mr. PENROSE, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill S. 5137, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, for the relief of Jacob Swartz, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

GEORGE RUBLEE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 251) was read, as follows:

Whereas on May 15, 1916, the Senate rejected the nomination of George Rublee as a member of the Federal Trade Commission; and
Whereas the act of May 1, 1884, volume 23, page 17, United States Statutes at Large, provides as follows:
"Hereafter no department or officer of the United States shall accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law, except in case of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property": Therefore be it

Resolved, That the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission be directed to inform the Senate at once under what authority of law George Rublee is now acting as a member of the Federal Trade Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON. Let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over under the rule.

RURAL-CREDITS SYSTEM.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I have a copy of a communication from Hon. Marion Butler addressed to the chairman of the joint congressional committee on rural credits relative to the essentials of an efficient rural-credits system. I ask that the communication be referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view to having it printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

CHILD LABOR—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the conferees on the so-called child-labor bill have reached an agreement by which the managers on the part of the House of Representatives have receded from their disagreement to the Senate amendments and have agreed thereto. My understanding is that the legal effect of that action is that the bill stands passed. However, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate also agree to the conference report.

Senators have suggested that, in order to save any question, the conference report should also be agreed to by the Senate, and I make that request.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have no objection to the conference report being agreed to, but I do not like to have it done with the idea that there is any necessity for it. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has been here a great deal longer time than I have, and I desire to inquire of the Senator that where the other House agrees to the Senate amendments to a House bill, which passes the bill in the form we have passed it, whether any further action on the part of the Senate is necessary? It would seem to me impossible that it should require action by the Senate, but I have no objection to such action.

Mr. ROBINSON. I myself think that it does not require action on the part of the Senate, but I have consulted with Senators who are members of the committee, including the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], and it was suggested that I take this course. I can see no objection to doing that, inasmuch as the action upon the part of the House is to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was consulted as to the matter by one Senator, and I suggested that my view was that the recession on the part of the House from its disagreement to the Senate amendment passed the bill, but, to "make assurance double sure," it might be well for the Senate to act. It can not do any harm to agree to the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senate can agree to the House report. If the Senator from Arkansas has a report to submit on behalf of the Senate conferees, that should be done.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have a report on the part of the Senate conferees, which I ask leave to present, and I move that it be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8234) to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

JOE T. ROBINSON,
MOSES E. CLAPP,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

DAVID J. LEWIS,
J. M. C. SMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 17398. An act granting the consent of Congress to the board of county commissioners of the county of Hampden, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, to construct a bridge across the Connecticut River between Springfield and West Springfield, in said county and Commonwealth, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m., Saturday, August 19, 1916) the Senate adjourned until Monday, August 21, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

MONDAY, August 21, 1916.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we come to Thee that we may find a larger unity of life, that is in Thee alone. We thank Thee that amid all the conflicts of opinion there ever flashes out among us expressions of fellowship and brotherhood which show that the currents of our life as a Nation are running true. We are ever looking to Thee for guidance that we may maintain this unity, that we may realize this brotherhood, that we may build up great institutions which may stand the test of time because they are founded upon the changeless law of God our Father. Hear us to-day in our prayer. Guide us in the discharge of the duties of the day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Friday, August 18, 1916, when, on request of Mr. BRANDEGEE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Myers	Sheppard

Brandegee	Hardwick	O'Gorman	Smith, Ga.
Bryan	Hughes	Oliver	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Husting	Overman	Smith, S. C.

Curtis	McLean	Ransdell	Vardaman
Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Robinson	Warren
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Shafroth

Mr. JONES. The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. POMERENE. I present a petition of H. M. Cramer and numerous other signers. I ask that the body of the petition without the names be incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I could not hear a word the Senator said.

Mr. POMERENE. I am presenting a petition numerously signed asking for legislation providing for arbitration in disputes between railroad companies and their employees. I ask that the body of the petition be incorporated in the RECORD without reading. It is short.

Mr. SMOOT. Without the signatures?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; it is very numerously signed.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and the body of the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, the undersigned citizens of the State of Ohio and among those comprising the more than 80 per cent of the employees of the railways of our State and country, being confronted with the possibility of an entire paralyzation of the railways of the country by the proposed general strike of the four orders of trainmen, a group of less than 20 per cent of the entire number of railway employees, and the consequent curtailment of income to us, and fully realizing that under this great Government, where the ruling doctrine is "The greatest good to the greatest number," we, the large majority—more than 80 per cent of the people to be directly injured by such destructive methods of the few who happen to be placed in a position where they can use them—have a clear and definite right to be protected (the general public and all other industries seriously endangered also having that right), do earnestly petition you, our Senators and Representatives, individually and as the Congress of the Nation, and pray that some definite legislative action be taken whereby the vast majority of the people of the country shall be protected from a destructive interruption of interstate commerce due to wholly selfish action of a small group of men, and that all differences which may arise between railway and employee shall be settled by proper arbitration. In this way you would recognize that fundamental principle of the Republic, that no small group of men ought to be permitted, directly or indirectly, to conspire to an end calculated to benefit them only, and directly or indirectly work wrong and loss upon the great majority.

Mr. OLIVER presented petitions of sundry labor unions of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HUSTING presented a memorial of the Wisconsin State Bankers' Association, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to provide for branch banking, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a petition of the Wisconsin State Bankers' Association, relative to the deposits which country banks under the Federal Reserve System must keep on hand, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a memorial of the Wisconsin State Bankers' Association, remonstrating against the establishment of a general system for the clearing of checks without charge, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Merchants' Association of Ukiah, Cal., praying for the settlement of the difficulties between the railroads and their employees by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10124) to add certain lands to the Rocky Mountain National Park, Colo., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 809) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 15096) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend sections 2275 and 2276 of the Revised Statutes of the United States providing for the selection of lands for educational purposes in lieu of those appropriated," and to authorize an exchange of lands between the United States and the several States, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 810) thereon.

SAC AND FOX INDIANS OF OKLAHOMA.

Mr. OWEN. From the Committee on Indian Affairs, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 16093) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of drainage assessments on Indian lands in Oklahoma." The bill has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior; it has the approval of the members of the Indian Affairs Committee who are present in the city; and no one is against it that I know of. The matter will have to be acted on within a month, otherwise the work will have to stop. I ask for its present consideration. It is a very short bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of drainage assessments on Indian lands in Oklahoma," approved July 19, 1912 (37 Stat. L., p. 194), be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to confer upon the Secretary of the Interior authority to subject Government lands of the Sac and Fox Indian Agency or the lands of the Sac and Fox Indian School or Agency in the Sac and Fox Agency of Lincoln County, Okla., to all of the provisions touching the organization of drainage districts and the construction of drain ditches and canals across said lands, or assessment for benefits conferred by the construction of said canals or ditches of the Deep Fork drainage district of Lincoln County, Okla., and that the provisions of said act shall apply in all particulars to the Sac and Fox Indian School lands and the lands of the Sac and Fox Indian Agency of said Lincoln County, Okla.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONNECTICUT RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 17398) granting the consent of Congress to the board of county commissioners of the County of Hampden, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, to construct a bridge across the Connecticut River between Springfield and West Springfield, in said county and Commonwealth, and I submit a report (No. 813) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOOLS AT JUNEAU, ALASKA.

Mr. PITTMAN. From the Committee on Territories I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 6839) to authorize the incorporated town of Juneau, Alaska, to issue bonds for the construction and equipment of schools therein, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 812) thereon.

The bill provides for permitting the town of Juneau, Alaska, to issue bonds to the amount of $75,000 for school purposes. This matter has been examined into by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and myself. A similar bill was introduced in the House and reported favorably by the Committee on Territories of the House. It is an emergency matter, and I think it should be passed. There is a little schoolhouse which was built in Juneau about 25 years ago. The town then had a population of about 500 people. It now has a population of 10,000, and such are the only school accommodations it possesses. It involves no liability on behalf of the Government, and I request the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the incorporated town of Juneau, Alaska, is hereby authorized and empowered to issue its bonds in any sum not exceeding $75,000 for the purpose of constructing a schoolhouse in said town and equipping the same.

SEC. 2. That before said bonds shall be issued a special election shall be ordered by the common council of the town of Juneau, at which election the question whether such bonds shall be issued shall be submitted to the qualified electors of said town of Juneau. Thirty days' notice of any such election shall be given by publication thereof in a newspaper printed and published and of general circulation in said town before the day fixed for such election.

SEC. 3. That the registration for such election, the manner of conducting the same, and the canvass of the returns of said election shall be, as nearly as practicable, in accordance with the requirements of law in general or special elections in said municipality, and said bonds shall be issued only upon the condition that a majority of the votes cast at such election in said town shall be in favor of issuing said bonds.

SEC. 4. That the bonds above specified, when authorized to be issued as hereinbefore provided shall bear interest at a rate not to exceed 7 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and shall not be sold for less than their par value with accrued interest and shall be in denominations not exceeding $1,000 each, the principal to be due in 10 years from date thereof: Provided, however, That the common council of said town of Juneau may reserve the right to pay off such bonds in their numerical order at the rate of $10,000, or less, thereof per annum from and after the expiration of four years from their date. Principal and interest shall be payable in lawful money of the United States of America at the office of the town treasurer of the town of Juneau, Alaska, or at such other place as may be designated by the common council of the town of Juneau; the place of payment to be mentioned in said bonds: And provided further, That each and every such bond shall have the written signature of the mayor and clerk of said town of Juneau and also bear the seal of said town.

SEC. 5. That no part of the funds arising from the sale of said bonds shall be used for any purpose other than that specified in this act. Said bonds shall be sold only in such amounts as the common council shall direct, and the proceeds thereof shall be disbursed by the school board of said town under the limitations hereinbefore imposed and under the direction of said common council from time to time as the same may be required for the purposes aforesaid.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator reporting the bill if the rate of 7 per cent interest on the bonds is not too high.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is quite high, but they expect to take the bonds locally and that is the rate of interest prevailing locally. I am informed by Mr. King, a member of the council, that they intend to take their bonds in the local community.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me even if the banks there bought the bonds the district certainly should not be compelled to pay 7 per cent. I am quite sure those bonds would be used by the banks there in case they wanted to borrow money and sell them in the United States. It seems to me as though it is opening a way to them to make a large profit by purchasing bonds at 7 per cent and then selling them in the eastern or Western States where the interest rate is very low, and that they would make a large profit in the transaction.

I can not see why a 5 per cent bond at most would not sell in Juneau at par. The Senator may know some reason why, but I can not for the life of me see anything on the face of the bill that would prevent speculation in the bonds, even if they were bought locally.

Mr. PITTMAN. I must confess I do not know. The matter of interest was determined by the city council and by Delegate WICKERSHAM, of Alaska. He is in closer touch with the situation than I am. I have not been up there for a great many years, but he seems to think that to make the bonds available and raise the money that rate of interest is necessary.

Mr. SMOOT. This is a Senate bill, and I ask the Senator if he will not accept an amendment striking out "seven" and inserting "five." Then, when the bill goes to the House, the matter can be taken up with Mr. WICKERSHAM, the Delegate. I think it would be very much better if that were the case.

Mr. PITTMAN. I agree with the Senator. I should like to have the interest rate reduced, and so I accept the suggestion.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I move to strike out the word "seven" and insert "five."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, page 2, line 13, before the words "per cent," it is proposed to strike out "seven" and to insert "five," so that it will read:

SEC. 4. That the bonds above specified, when authorized to be issued as hereinbefore provided, shall bear interest at a rate not to exceed 5 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and shall not be sold for less than their par value with accrued interest and shall be in denominations not exceeding $1,000 each, the principle to be due in 10 years from date thereof, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OSAGE INDIAN SCHOOL.

Mr. OWEN. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 6864) providing for the continuance of the Osage Indian School, Oklahoma, for a period of 10 years from January 1, 1917, and I submit a report (No. 811) thereon.

Mr. President, the Osage Indian School fund expires in 1916. The Secretary of the Interior asks that it be extended for 10 years, so that the school may be continued at Pawhuska. The money for that purpose comes out of the Indian fund. The bill which I have reported has a unanimous report from the Committee on Indian Affairs behind it. It is a very short bill, and, being a local matter, I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the third paragraph of section 4 of the act of June 28, 1906 (34 Stat. L., p. 539), is hereby amended to the extent that the moneys therein provided for support for Osage schools may be used in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior for the same purposes as provided in said paragraph for a further period of not exceeding 10 years from the 1st day of January, 1917, on the condition of establishing vocational instruction in such schools.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma for the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REFUNDS OF DRAWBACKS (S. DOC. NO. 532.)

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Printing, to which the subject was referred reported the following resolution (S. Res. 252), and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the statement of drawbacks under the present tariff act, during the fiscal years 1914–1916, as transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of the Treasury, under date of July 26, 1916, in response to Senate resolutions dated January 10 and July 5, 1916, be printed as a Senate document.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate concurred on last Saturday in the amendments made by the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5886) extending the time for the completion of the bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn., authorized by an act entitled "An act to amend an act approved July 20, 1912, entitled 'An act to authorize the Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River,' approved August 23, 1912."

I will say, in connection with the motion, that I was quite surprised that a motion to concur in the House amendments had been made and at the circumstances under which it was made. The bill relates to an extension of the time for the completion of the bridge across the Mississippi River, at Memphis, Tenn., and into the State of Arkansas. It is not technically a bridge bill at all, although, of course, in a broad way it is; but it contains some affirmative provisions of legislation that I think ought to be the subject of conference between the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], who introduced the bill, my colleague, and myself, and I think we ought to have that opportunity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What disposition does the Senator from Arkansas desire to have made of the bill?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let the bill and amendments of the House be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill and amendments of the House will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CLARKE of Akansas. I can not understand how the bill ever got before the Senate. Some days since, intending to reserve the right of consultation with the Senators mentioned, I got the bill from the Secretary's desk and put it in my desk, hoping thereby to prevent its inadvertent consideration. I find the statement in reference to the matter this morning in the RECORD. I am not quite advised as to how the bill could have gotten before the Senate, unless there are duplicate copies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas only got a copy of the bill. The original is at the desk.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Very well. I return the copy which I have. I thought I had the original in my possession.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 6914) granting an increase of pension to William D. Collins; and

A bill (S. 6915) granting an increase of pension to Charles P. Betts (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MYERS:

HEIGHT OF BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a gentleman greatly interested in the development of the District of Columbia has handed me a bill, requesting that I introduce it. It appears to be framed very largely along the lines of an ordinance of the city of New York governing the erection of buildings, and so forth. I do not know that I approve of all the provisions of the bill, but I ask that it be received and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill (S. 6922) to regulate and limit the height and bulk of buildings hereafter erected, and regulating and determining the area of yards, courts, and other open spaces, and regulating and restricting the location of trades and industries and the location of buildings designed for specified uses, and establishing the boundaries of districts for the said purposes in the District of Columbia, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

TRAINING CAMP AT FORT DOUGLAS, UTAH.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to make a favorable report from the Committee on Military Affairs on the bill (S. 6924) to provide for the maintenance of a training camp on the military reservation of Fort Douglas, Utah, and I submit a report (No. 814) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that this is a very urgent matter, and the reason why I want it acted upon at this time is that it may go to the House and be acted upon there to-morrow. I have the assurance that that action will be taken if the bill passes the Senate to-day. It provides for the maintenance of a training camp at Fort Douglas, Utah, that begins to-day. In conference with the Secretary of War, Gen. Scott, and Gen. Bliss on Saturday this program was agreed to, and they sent me a copy of the bill to-day. I introduced the bill this morning and asked to have it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and it was so referred; and the committee now report it back favorably to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to maintain upon the military reservation at Fort Douglas, Utah, for such period within the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, as he may deem advisable, a camp for the military instruction and training of such citizens as may be selected for such instruction and training under such regulations as he may prescribe, and to furnish to said citizens the subsistence, transportation, and uniforms authorized by the act of Congress, approved June 3, 1916; and for the purposes of this act there is hereby appropriated the sum of $30,000, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, before the bill is passed I should like to ask my friend from Oregon how many of these military camps we have.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There are several pending. There is one in New York; there will be others in the West; and there is a question in the mind of the Secretary of War as to whether there is money available at this time. This will be deducted from the regular appropriation when the Army bill becomes a law.

Mr. STONE. Yes; but that is not the point. Can any Senator answer my question? I understand there is a military training camp at Plattsburg, N. Y. What others are there, and where are they located?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is one to be held at American Lake, in the State of Washington, where the young men from Oregon and Washington, who desire to participate will assemble, and there may be one in California. They have all been determined upon; but this is the only one that is pending now.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that they meet to-day, and that is the reason why the Secretary of War desires the authority.

Mr. STONE. I am not objecting to the appropriation. I am merely asking for information as to the number of these training camps and their location, either existing or contemplated, and the probable expense of maintaining them. Personally I very much favor the establishment of these training camps, but at the same time we ought to have some idea as to just how far we are going in the establishing of them.

Mr. SMOOT. The Army appropriation bill provides for all of them. It provides for the maintenance and the transportation of those participating in the training camps; but in this case they are to meet to-day in Salt Lake City. I will say to the Senator that the Secretary of War has already issued the requisition to the railroads to carry them to Fort Douglas.

Mr. STONE. Oh, well, the Senator is addressing himself to this particular occasion.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know how many there are.

Mr. STONE. Can any Senator tell me how many of these training camps are contemplated?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know, Mr. President. That information, however, can be secured from the War Department, and if the Senator wants it, I will be glad to obtain it for him. I do not know that the Secretary can inform us how many applications there will be.

Mr. STONE. Then, let me ask, does the law as it stands leave this matter wholly to the War Department?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. To the Secretary of War; yes.

Mr. STONE. To establish them in any number he pleases and where he pleases?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Within the limits of the appropriation, of course.

Mr. STONE. And the appropriation is how much?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This is $30,000, but the general appropriation bill carries $4,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all it will take for the camp at Fort Douglas.

Mr. STONE. If the Secretary of War has $4,000,000 at his disposal for this purpose, why does he need a special authorization of $30,000?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the Army bill has been vetoed, and it has to be passed again by the House first.

Mr. STONE. It is in view of that situation?

Mr. SMOOT. It is in view of that situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE RUBLEE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there concurrent or other resolutions?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if there be no concurrent or other resolutions, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolution which I submitted on Saturday last, which went over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The resolution (S. Res. 251) was read, as follows:

Whereas on May 15, 1916, the Senate rejected the nomination of George Rublee as a member of the Federal Trade Commission; and

Whereas the act of May 1, 1884, volume 23, page 17, United States Statutes at Large, provides as follows:

"Hereafter no department or officer of the United States shall accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law, except in case of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property": Therefore be it

Resolved, That the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission be directed to inform the Senate at once under what authority of law George Rublee is now acting as a member of the Federal Trade Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question or two concerning the resolution, if he has no objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have none.

Mr. ROBINSON. The resolution assumes that Mr. Rublee is acting as a member of the Federal Trade Commission. I have no information upon the subject, and I want to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether or not it would meet his desires to so amend the resolution as to inquire whether Mr. Rublee is acting as a member of that commission?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to such an amendment. My information is that the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission has recently stated to certain parties who desired the information that Mr. Rublee, though now on a vacation, was still a member of the Federal Trade Commission. That is all I know about it. How does the Senator from Arkansas propose to amend the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON. On line 2, after the word "once," I propose to insert the words "whether George Rublee is now acting as a member of said commission, and."

Mr. GALLINGER. "If so."

Mr. ROBINSON. So that it will read:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission be directed to inform the Senate at once whether George Rublee is now acting as a member of said commission——

Mr. GALLINGER. "And if so"——

Mr. ROBINSON (continuing)—

And if so, under what authority of law he is so acting.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to that amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the resolution so that if amended it will read:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission be directed to inform the Senate at once whether George Rublee is now acting as a member of said commission; and if so, under what authority of law he is so acting.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all right.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. As I understand the facts, Mr. Rublee was appointed to be a member of the Federal Trade Commission by the President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. STONE. And his name was sent to the Senate?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. STONE. And during the present session of the Senate the appointment was rejected by a vote of the Senate?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. STONE. There the matter rests?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Now, the Senator assumes in his resolution that Mr. Rublee is still acting as a member of that commission——

Mr. GALLINGER. I have every reason to believe so.

Mr. STONE. Notwithstanding the action of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator, has it not been the rule of procedure, the recognized rule under the law, that when a man has been nominated to an office and his name has been sent to the Senate and the Senate refuses to advise and consent to his appointment, the appointee having taken office under an appointment made in vacation, as I understand to have been the case in this instance, he continues to hold the position and perform the functions of the office until his successor has been appointed, if the new appointment is made during the session of the Senate, or otherwise until the adjournment of the Senate?

Mr. GALLINGER. I know of no such law. There is a provision in the Constitution which has been cited in support of that contention. I am very well satisfied, however, that that provision of the Constitution never was intended to apply where a rejection followed the nomination.

As bearing on this question, I cited on Saturday last one provision of law, which is found in the resolution, and I will now cite another provision of law that has come to my attention, found in United States Revised Statutes, section 1761, page 313. It is as follows:

SEC. 1761. No money shall be paid from the Treasury as salary to any person appointed during the recess of the Senate to fill a vacancy in any existing office if the vacancy existed while the Senate was in session and was by law required to be filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate until such appointee has been confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. Rublee's case comes directly under the provisions of that statute, and I think it is conclusive, he having been appointed during a recess of the Senate. It clearly shows that Mr. Rublee is not entitled to hold office; but, at best, all I have asked is that the commission inform the Senate under what authority Mr. Rublee is acting as a commissioner, if he is so acting. I feel sure that he ought not to be in that position.

In the District of Columbia appropriation bill of this year our attention was called to the fact that a certain gentleman who had been rejected as a member of the Excise Board of the District of Columbia was still performing the functions of that office. The committee having charge of the bill inserted a provision, which was subsequently agreed to in conference, that no part of the money appropriated should be paid to that gentleman while he was exercising the functions of that office in the face of a rejection on the part of the Senate.

The difficulty, as I see it, is that if Mr. Rublee is allowed to remain there until the end of this session of Congress, provided it shall then be claimed there is a vacancy, he can the very next day be appointed again; and if he is again allowed to remain until the end of that session, he can be appointed again; so that it is an endless chain.

Mr. STONE. Of course, the Senator knows that is an old contention.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. STONE. We have heard that contention here time and again, and it was because of that that I asked the Senator the question as to what had apparently been the general interpretation of the Constitution and the law and what had been the practice in this behalf. I have no personal objection to the adoption of the resolution and sending it to the chairman of the Trade Commission for a reply; but my inquiry was simply to ascertain from the Senator in advance whether it had not been for years and years the practice in cases where men had been appointed in vacation and their names sent to the Senate and rejected, for them to hold over until the end of the session; and I think it has frequently happened that, upon the adjournment of the Senate, the same person was then reappointed by the President to hold over during the vacation of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume that some instances can be found where men rejected by the Senate have, under the provision of the Constitution which has been alluded to, but which I feel sure does not apply in cases of rejection, have held over; but I feel very sure that if we should examine the records we would find that as a rule men rejected by the Senate——

Mr. STONE. I am free to say to the Senator that if the Senate rejects a man I think he is not entitled to be reappointed, and I doubt very seriously whether he is entitled to continue in office.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I will complete my sentence, if the Senator from Arkansas will permit me.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very familiar with the provision of the Constitution which the Senator from Arkansas is going to read. I was about to say that I think the record will show and the precedents of the Senate will demonstrate conclusively that men rejected by the Senate have, as a rule, abandoned the office. I think a man ought to have fairness enough in his make-up, if not honor enough, when the Senate exercises its right under the Constitution to reject his nomination for any given position, to retire; but if he is held in office under the provision of the Constitution the Senator from Arkansas is going to read, but which I think is not applicable, it is very evident that he can be kept in forever and ever, provided it can be made to appear that a vacancy exists. He can be appointed over and over again and held in office until the end of the next session of Congress in each instance. I do not believe that the Constitution so intends, and I know very well that the two statutes I have cited do not sustain that view.

I have no feeling particularly about this matter, and never have had a great deal of feeling about it. I did believe that Mr. Rublee ought not to have been appointed as a citizen of New Hampshire, representing the minority party, and I did what I could to secure his rejection, as I had a right to do.

Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the Chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire will yield to me, I know the Senator from New Hampshire is familiar with the last clause of section 2, Article II, of the Constitution, which provides:

> The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session.

I had not intended to enter into any discussion of the matter now, and have no objection to the passage of the resolution in the form it has taken; but I do think that the question involved is quite a serious one as to the legal right of an appointee to continue in service until the end of the session of Congress following his appointment, even though he has been rejected by the Senate. I am not speaking now of the propriety of his doing so; I do not care at this time to have anything to say on that subject; but, so far as his right to continue is concerned, it seems to be governed by the section of the Constitution which I have just read. When the President makes an appointment under a literal construction of this section, no matter what happens in the Senate, the commission does not expire until the end of the session following the appointment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just for a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very familiar with the provision of the Constitution the Senator has read; but, as I have said twice already, I do not believe it can properly apply in the case of a rejection, because the Senator from Arkansas will agree with me that if that is to be the law, at the end of the present session Mr. Rublee can be again appointed and serve until the end of the next session, and at the end of that session he can be again appointed. Of course, it would be a question for the Senate to decide whether he should be paid or not.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Because the statute says he shall not be paid, and another statute says that no department of the Government shall accept voluntary service, unpaid service.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, if the President should in the meantime appoint another person, that would operate as a revocation of the commission already issued.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is not any doubt about that, and it seems to me that that ought to be done.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think there is any doubt about that; but that is not the case here. The appointment has not been made, and it simply becomes a question of law, as I see it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Arkansas, then, in view of the concession he has just made, whether he does not think that that provision means when the Senate takes no action?

Mr. ROBINSON. No. The Supreme Court, I think, has passed upon that matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Supreme Court has acted in one case, but that decision does not cover this case at all. I have examined it with great care. The Senator will find the citation at the foot of the section he has just read; and if the Senator, as a lawyer—and of course a much better lawyer than I am, because I am not a lawyer at all—will examine that case with care, he will see that it does not apply.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am familiar with that case. It is not exactly in point; but I think the literal language of the Constitution, providing that the commission shall expire at the end of the next session, would control unless in the meantime the commission should be revoked.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] was very much interested in this appointment, and he is not here. It seems to me the matter should not be pressed in his absence.

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the junior Senator from New Hampshire doing at the present time?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think he is in Chicago, but likely temporarily.

Mr. GALLINGER. What service is he performing?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know what service he is performing.

Mr. ROBINSON. The service of his country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; the service of his country, for the Democratic Party.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know what position he would want to take on this resolution, Mr. President. Perhaps he would agree to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I do not propose to postpone this so that the junior Senator from New Hampshire can be brought from the duties he is performing in Chicago at the present time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, well, he is performing the same duties that various Members on the Republican side of the Chamber have often performed in the same way.

Mr. GALLINGER. Possibly so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

POST OFFICE AND COURTHOUSE, BALTIMORE, MD.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of an emergency bill which I think it is very important to have passed at this session of Congress. It is Order of Business 719—Senate bill 4356.

Mr. HARDWICK. What is it?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say, in explanation of the bill——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I gave notice that at the conclusion of the morning business to-day I would submit some remarks upon a topic of present interest.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that this emergency bill will take only a minute, and, if he will pardon me, I should like to have it disposed of.

Mr. THOMAS. I was going to say that if it is a matter that will not lead to discussion, of course, I shall not object.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It will only take a minute.

Mr. THOMAS. Otherwise I should be compelled to object if it does provoke controversy.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is it about?

Mr. SMOOT. Let the title of the bill be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4356) to enlarge, extend, remodel, and repair the United States post-office and courthouse building located at Baltimore, Md.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, are we taking up the calendar or is this a motion?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. This is a bill which I have asked unanimous consent to consider. It is a very important emergency bill, which I will explain if the Senate desires to hear it explained.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I shall not object to the immediate consideration of this bill, but I want to say that I think we are proceeding in a rather irregular way. The people of the West have upon the calendar a bill known as the grazing homestead bill. It has been on the calendar for this entire session. If it is passed and becomes a law, it will furnish homes for thousands of families, and yet we are unable to get time or consent to consider that important bill. However, I shall not object to the consideration of this particular bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 12, after the word "building," to insert "including all necessary relocation and installation of street railway tracks on the site of said building," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the present post office at Baltimore, Md., to be enlarged, extended, remodeled, and repaired for the better accommodation of the post office and other governmental offices in said city, at a cost not exceeding $50,000, including all changes in, extension of, or additions and repairs to the heating, hoisting, ventilating, and plumbing systems and elevators therein which may become necessary by reason of or incident to such enlargement, extension, remodeling, or repairs of said building or which it may be found expedient to make to such heating, hoisting, ventilating, and plumbing systems and elevators because of such enlargement, extension, remodeling, or repair of said building; and the annual appropriations for the general maintenance of public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department shall be construed to be available for all other repairs to and equipment of said building, grounds, and approaches, heating, hoisting, ventilating, and plumbing systems, elevators, or apparatus of such building, including all necessary relocation and installation of street railway tracks on the site of said building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado gave notice that he would address the Senate this morning, and of course I am not going to interfere with that; but there is a bill which was reported from the Public Lands Committee this morning, which I believe might pass without discussion. It is exceedingly important; that is, a bill which has for its purpose the ratifying of certain titles which have been jeopardized by reason of the transfer heretofore made between the Interior Department and the State. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of that bill, if the Senator will permit me; and if it leads to any discussion I will withdraw it.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, with that understanding I will yield the floor; but of course——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia will state it.

Mr. THOMAS. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator does not have to yield the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Any Senator has a right to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not understand what he said.

Mr. HARDWICK. A parliamentary inquiry. During the morning hour, after the conclusion of the morning business, is not any Senator who wishes to make a motion to take up any bill that is in order entitled to the floor in preference to any Senator who has not the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A Senator is entitled to the floor when he is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. But for what purpose? To make a speech, or to transact business that is in order under the rules? The morning hour is intended for the transaction of certain business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, but then there are certain motions that are in order during the morning hour. I think all the precedents are——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order after the completion of the morning business——

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unless some Senator moves to proceed to the consideration of a particular bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly. Now, the query I raise is, if a Senator wanted to make an address during that particular time when these several proceedings would be in order, whether he would not at least have to wait until he got something on which to make a speech; and whether a Senator who claims the right to make a motion that is in order is not entitled to the floor, even if he is perfectly willing—as I am sure he would be in the case I have in mind—to yield to the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not any doubt about the right of a Senator, after the morning business is closed and until the expiration of the morning hour, to make a motion to take up any bill on the calendar.

Mr. HARDWICK. And he is entitled to be recognized for that purpose?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He is entitled to be recognized for that purpose. The mere giving of notice on the calendar does not confer any right.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to make a statement?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. If I am not following the unbroken precedents of the Senate in giving notice, and then claiming the floor after the close of the morning hour, I want to be set right. If an exception is to be made in my case, that also is a matter of some personal importance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado knows, of course, that these speeches that are to be delivered during the morning hour are delivered only by the common consent of the Members of the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. I am perfectly well aware of that, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no right under the rules to put these notices on the calendar.

Mr. THOMAS. I am perfectly well aware of the practice as stated by the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. At the same time, I am not aware that any objection has ever been made heretofore to the practice.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. THOMAS. Why, from the position which I understand the Chair to take, I have no right to the floor, notwithstanding my notice.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator from Colorado will allow me, I think I can solve this problem and give him a subject on which he can talk. As the Chair has ruled that this is still the morning hour, and that a Senator has a right to rise and make a motion, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10384, generally known as the immigration bill. When the Senate shall have disposed of that motion, then the Senator can proceed with his speech.

I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10384.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, did I not prefer a request for unanimous consent? I thought I did.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to be heard on that request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request of the Senator from Idaho must be first disposed of.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to be heard on that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MYERS. I want to say to the Senator from Idaho that that bill has just been reported with a large number of amendments. There are quite a number of Senators who are interested in it; and while I am quite as anxious to get the relief which it affords as the Senator from Idaho is, I think the bill had better go over and be printed, so as to give Senators a day or two to look into the amendments that are suggested.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the Chair to recognize the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and he was proceeding; and until the question of his right to proceed was raised I did not understand that any objection was made to the Senator's proceeding. If there was an objection made, I should like to know who made it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood there to be an objection on the part of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Georgia had no objection to the Senator from Colorado speaking just as long as he wanted to speak. He always enlightens the Senate. There is no Member of the Senate of whom I am fonder. But Senators have certain rights at this time, and one of the Senators, to my certain knowledge, wanted to exercise that right. The Senator from Colorado can speak just as well on this motion if it prevails, and I hope my friend from Idaho will not press his request.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The question is whether any other motion was in order when the Senator from Colorado had the floor.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not hear the Chair recognize the Senator from South Carolina, who made a motion.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, yes; he did.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator got up and proceeded to talk, and the Chair did not recognize him at all Now, I simply want orderly procedure here. Of course, if the morning business was closed the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII was in order.

The Senator from Colorado rose and was recognized. If any Senator wanted to object to his proceeding with his remarks he could move to proceed to consider something else, or he could file his objection, or the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII could go on; but until some Senator definitely objects to the Senator from Colorado pursuing his remarks I think the Senator ought to be allowed to go on.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have not yielded the floor. I wish to continue my remarks.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator never had the floor. The Chair recognized the Senator from Colorado, and he is the only one who has the floor; and I raise that question of order.

Mr. MYERS. The floor was taken away from me without my consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Senator from Montana is out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] rose to a question of order. There are two things that are privileged in the Senate of the United States: One is a question of personal privilege, and the other is a question of order. The Senator rose to the latter question, and, of course, he has the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The question of order is simply that the Chair having recognized the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], who was proceeding, he is entitled to the floor, and unanimous consent is to be presumed, and he has the right to proceed unless an objection is made.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate on the question of order.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for one sentence?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I may.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, a number of Senators have spoken to me and said that they wanted this bill printed; they wanted an opportunity to read it in print, and observe the amendments that were reported; and solely upon that ground, and no other, I object to the request for consideration to-day.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to tender my apology to the Senator from Colorado, because I had no idea of taking him off the floor. I thought this bill, from what I understood, would pass without any discussion or debate, in five minutes or three minutes, and it was not my intention to interfere with his speech at all.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. On the question of order raised by the Senator from Connecticut, the facts are these, as I recall them:

The Senator from Colorado had given a previous notice that at the conclusion of the morning business—not the morning hour—he expected to address the Senate. Before the Senator from Colorado could carry out that intention, when he had merely addressed the Chair, and before he had begun his remarks, or before he could get or even ask unanimous consent, the Senator from Georgia raised the question of order as to whether or not, at the conclusion of the morning business and before the expiration of the morning hour, when certain motions were in order under the rules, a Senator was not entitled to recognition who wanted to make a motion in order under the rules at that time. The Chair ruled—and ruled properly, I believe—that he could.

I want to say, merely in explanation of the position that I took and that I still take here, that there was no possible discourtesy intended to the Senator from Colorado by that. There is no Member of this body who regards that Senator more highly than I do. As a matter of fact, however, this particular time, under the rules, is dedicated to certain forms of business, and I do not think it is a discourtesy to any Senator to ask him to postpone his remarks, under the very liberal rules about debate that we have in this body, until we can transact the actual business that is before the Senate, or that is pressing for attention under the rules applicable at that particular time. The Vice President ruled, and I think ruled properly, that any Senator who desired to make a motion before the morning hour was over was in order, and had precedence in point of recognition over a Senator who had no business to offer during that period.

If the Senator from Colorado will wait until this motion is voted on, if it is voted up under the rules of the Senate he can be heard as long as he desires to be heard on the measure moved by the Senator from South Carolina. I do not see any discourtesy to him in that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator recognizes that his motion will elicit debate.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the very point. It can not be debated. It is not subject to debate unless made after 2 o'clock.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Suppose it its adopted?

Mr. HARDWICK. Then the Senator from Colorado can take the floor and speak on it for seven hours if he desires.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but it is not on the immigration bill that he wants to speak.

Mr. HARDWICK. He can speak on that now.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I rise to a question of personal provilege.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On the question of order I should like to be heard, if the Chair will allow me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina rises to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, I did not understand.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I want to disclaim any discourtesy to the Senator from Colorado. The question has been raised as to the order, and it was also stated that there was nothing before the Senate, and now, out of the abundant kindness of my heart, I think I should give to the Senator from Colorado a nail to hang his speech on, if he did not have one already.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to another question of order. The Senator from South Carolina is not stating a question of privilege.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am stating a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I make the point of order that it is not a question of personal privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is unable to state what the Senator himself thinks is a question of personal privilege.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I prefer to decide that myself, Mr. President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Chair can state what the Chair thinks is a question of personal privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are a great many things done here with which the Chair does not agree.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I want to disclaim any discourtesy to the Senator from Colorado, and under the ruling of the Chair I simply ask for a vote on this question. Then I will be very glad to yield the floor to the Senator or to any Senator to speak, as is done here almost every day, on any subject he pleases. I now make my motion.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MYERS. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I make the point of order that a Senator can not take the floor on a question of personal privilege and then make a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill.

Mr. MYERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana will state it.

Mr. MYERS. I just want to say in one sentence that I had no intention whatever of interfering with the speech of the Senator from Colorado. I want to hear him. I think he ought to be heard. But the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] asked unanimous consent, and I was compelled to object in order to keep his request from being granted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I hope Gaston will be allowed to make a statement now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, which is not debatable.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not propose to debate it. I raise the point, Mr. President, that no one has specifically objected to the Senator from Colorado proceeding.

Mr. HARDWICK. If my colleague wants to put it that way, I object.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is all right; that settles it.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask a parliamentary question. Is the motion made by the Senator from South Carolina amendable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not.

Mr. STONE. By moving to take up another bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not.

Mr. STONE. I should like to take up the woman suffrage amendment, and therefore furnish a real basis for the speech of the Senator from Colorado.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not amendable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to proceed to the consideration of the immigration bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10384) to regulate the immigration of aliens to, and the residence of aliens in, the United States, which had been reported from the Committee on Immigration with amendments.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if it is in order, I would just like to state to the Senate that this is practically the same bill, with very slight modifications, that has been before the Senate twice. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that we proceed immediately to consider the slight amendments made by the committee. I do not think any debate is really necessary in view of the fact that it practically has been debated ad libitum here for several years.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will pardon me, I shall not object to dispensing with the formal reading of the bill if the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is allowed to proceed.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will take pleasure in yielding to the Senator from Colorado now.

Mr. THOMAS. In view of the occurrences of this morning I do not know what my rights are. If further objection is made, I will not speak at all under the notice which I gave on Friday.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Oh, no; I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to dispensing with the formal reading of the bill and that it be read for action upon the amendments of the committee, the committee amendments to be first considered? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Immigration was, in section 2, page 3, line 24, before the word "exceptions," to strike out "the" and insert "these," so as to read:

That the said tax shall not be levied on account of aliens who enter the United States after an uninterrupted residence of at least one year immediately preceding such entrance in the Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, the Republic of Cuba, or the Republic of Mexico, for a temporary stay, nor on account of otherwise admissible residents or citizens of any possession of the United States, nor on account of aliens in transit through the United States, nor upon aliens who have been lawfully admitted to the United States and who later shall go in transit from one part of the United States to another through foreign contiguous territory, and the Commissioner General of Immigration with the approval of the Secretary of Labor shall issue rules and regulations and prescribe the conditions necessary to prevent abuse of these exceptions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 6, line 13, after the words "foreign port or," to insert "their," so as to read:

Persons likely to become a public charge; persons who have been deported under any of the provisions of this act, and who may again seek admission within one year from the date of such deportation, unless prior to their reembarkation at a foreign port or their attempt to be admitted from foreign contiguous territory the Secretary of Labor shall have consented to their reapplying for admission.

All children under 16 years of age, unaccompanied by or not coming to one or both of their parents, except that any such children may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, be admitted if in his opinion they are not likely to become a public charge and are otherwise eligible, unless otherwise provided for by existing treaties, persons who are natives of islands not possessed by the United States adjacent to the Continent of Asia, situate south of the twentieth parallel of latitude north, west of the one hundred and sixtieth meridian of longitude east from Greenwich, and north of the tenth parallel of latitude south, or who are natives of any country, province, or dependency situate on the Continent of Asia west of the one hundred and tenth meridian of longitude east from Greenwich and east of the fiftieth meridian of longitude east from Greenwich, except that portion of said territory situate between the fiftieth and the sixty-fourth meridians of longitude east from Greenwich and the twenty-fourth and thirty-eighth parallels of latitude north. It shall be the duty of the Commissioner General of Immigration to detail officers of the Immigration Service from time to time as may be necessary, in his judgment, to secure information as to the number of aliens detained in the penal, reformatory, and charitable institutions (public and private) of the several States and Territories, the District of Columbia, and other territory of the United States.

The next amendment was, in section 33, page 61, line 20, before the word "convention," to strike out "agreement," so as to read:

SEC. 33. That it shall be unlawful and be deemed a violation of the preceding section to pay off or discharge any alien employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place, unless duly admitted pursuant to the laws and treaties of the United States regulating the immigration of aliens: Provided, That in case any such alien intends to reship on board any other vessel bound to any foreign port or place, he shall be allowed to land for the purpose of so reshipping, under such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe to prevent aliens not admissible under any law, convention, or treaty from remaining permanently in the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to further amendment. If there be no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I voted against the motion to take up this bill because I do not believe that this is the most desirable time to have it considered. I have voted for practically the same measure twice previously; and I also voted to pass it over one President's veto. I regretted that the other House failed to pass the bill at the last session over the President's veto. Had it done so, and sent the bill to the Senate, I should have cordially joined with those Senators who favored the bill to pass it over the President's veto.

I shall vote for the bill now. I am cordially in favor of it. I do not know what direction it may take later on, but if the bill should be passed and come back to us with a veto I shall vote to pass it in spite of the veto.

I believe in the literacy test as practically the best test that we have so far found. I am fully aware of the fact that there is no influx of immigrants at present and that there is no immediate necessity for the passage of the bill. Until the close of the European war the bill will really not be needed. That was one of the reasons why I desired to see the consideration of the bill postponed until the first week in December next. It has been agreed by a majority of the Members upon this side that, while they would not vote to take the bill up at this time, it should come up as the first order of business the first week in December and be kept the unfinished business until it was voted upon. This is the explanation of the vote of the majority of those Democrats who voted against taking up the measure. Their vote was not inspired by their hostility to the bill. It was caused by the determination agreed upon in the Democratic conference to press the bill during the first week in December. Since, however, a majority of the Senate have decided to take the bill up this morning, and my vote against taking it up left me in the minority, I shall now vote for the bill. I cordially approve its provisions, as I understand them, and I shall support it whenever it comes to a vote in the Senate on every occasion, with the hope that it may become a law.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I voted against taking up this measure at this time not because I am opposed to its essential features but because its provisions relating to the exclusion of Asiatics have not been considered by the Senate. I understand that by drawing a line through the Asiatic countries, the twentieth parallel of north latitude and other limitations, as provided in the bill, there will be a neutral zone, as it were, which might allow, without violating the law, the immigration of people whose presence in the United States is not only undesirable but which the law itself, as proposed by the committee, contemplates excluding.

Inasmuch as this matter has been brought up unexpectedly, it appears to me that a subject of so much importance should be reconsidered. For that purpose, and for that purpose only, I move that the immigration bill be recommitted to the Committee on Immigration for the purpose of giving a hearing upon the sufficiency of the provisions of the bill relating to Asiatic immigration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to make a statement in reference to this matter. As we all know, several years ago the question of the admission of certain aliens became very acute on the Pacific coast. The then President of the United States took this matter up and solved the problem, temporarily at least, by entering into what is now known as a "gentlemen's agreement." The country from which came these aliens, who were objected to by the people of the western coast, entered into a verbal agreement that they would not permit these immigrants to come any more. That agreement is known as the passport agreement or understanding, as it appears in the meager accounts of this matter, and which has been pending here. It was to the effect that under the "favored-nation" clause we would allow them to remain in the text of the treaty as it is, with the proviso in a law which was subsequently entered into, that any infringement of this law or the breaking of the agreement on the part of the foreign country should immediately invest the President with the power to forbid any immigration whatever from that country. When we came to frame the law objection was made that the agreement should be construed as being in the same category as other laws, in that it was for that very purpose that the foreign country entered into that agreement with us, without further protest of a different nature; that it should be kept from the appearance of a law putting them in the category of other nations with whom they did not care to be classed.

We entered into the agreement, and, so far as your committee is informed, the agreement has been kept. In order to keep faith on the part of the United States your committee felt that it was their duty to carry out to the letter every agreement which this Government entered into with another Government. In order to avoid doing the very thing which we had agreed not to do we did not refer to that agreement as a convention or a treaty, but we simply drew longitudinal and latitudinal lines that excluded the very people that we wish to exclude, and kept our agreement without any offense, it being just as binding, however, as though the words were used.

A careful examination of the map will show the lines that we have drawn, with the little exception in it which takes cognizance of a treaty we have with a nation which gives them these rights. We drew a line around that. Otherwise the geographical exclusion is what the Senate and the House had voted on from time to time. We thought it better, if it met the approval of the country, and that we were less likely to give offense, after having entered into an agreement, to use longitudinal and latitudinal lines, including the islands and including that part of the continent of Asia from which we desire to exclude immigration, and not involve the delicate question—which was a very delicate one, indeed—which gave the committee considerable trouble. As a matter, of course, we were faithful and loyal in attempting to carry out the wishes and the desires of the American people by excluding those whom we were excluding, but doing it with the least possible offense under the circumstances.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator not give the Senate, however, the exact part of Asia which the longitudinal and latitudinal lines exclude?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I intended to hang a map on the wall, which would give that information. Under the provisions of the bill the inhabitants of the islands adjacent to the continent of Asia south of the twentieth parallel of latitude north, west of the one hundred and sixtieth meridian of longitude east from Greenwich, and north of the tenth parallel of latitude south are excluded. That will include the islands of the South Seas——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does it exclude the inhabitants of China and Japan?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Inhabitants of China are excluded by acts of Congress, Japan by agreement. This provision in the bill is designed to exclude others than persons from those countries. Emigration from China is covered by the Chinese-exclusion act. We have a statute with reference to that subject, so that this bill can not affect that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How is it as to the Japanese?

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator has just stated that the geographical line drawn excludes immigrants from China and Japan. Does the Senator mean to state that?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; I meant to state that we have not excluded them by the geographical lines, but we have otherwise excluded inhabitants of these islands which, if their names were set forth, would compel us to use the name of Japan.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] hands me a colored map——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I think, in view of the colloquy between the Senator from South Carolina and one or two other Senators who have addressed inquiries to him, that we have touched upon a subject that might with great propriety be considered in executive session, and I move that we now proceed to the consideration of this bill behind closed doors.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator means merely this portion of the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York, as the Chair understands, moves under the rule that the Senate proceed behind closed doors.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Limiting that suggestion to the portion of the bill only that deals with the immediate amendment to which the Senator from South Carolina is referring and the suggested amendment by the Senator from California, I second the motion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. VARDAMAN Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That, as I understand, ends the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment until the Chair can turn to the rule. [A pause.] The Sergeant at Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is not that a matter requiring a vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion has been seconded, and a vote is not required under the rule.

Thereupon the Senate proceeded to deliberate behind closed doors. After 30 minutes (at 2 o'clock p. m.) the doors were reopened.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 16763, to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10384) to regulate the immigration of aliens to, and the residence of aliens in, the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the immigration bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not wish to discuss the immigration question nor the advisability of legislation on that question during this session, but I think there is no reason why the unfinished business of the Senate, which is the revenue bill, should be summarily laid aside in order that the immigration bill may be considered. I think it is more important that we should dispose of the revenue bill than that we should dispose of the immigration bill at this time. We have had a program here. A part of that program is the pending revenue bill. A bill to raise the money to pay a larger part of the expenses of the Government was, after due deliberation on the part of the Senate, made the unfinished business.

Suddenly we find the Senate has expressed itself in favor of action on the immigration bill. That new situation, Mr. President, I do not think calls for any change in the action of the Senate on Saturday in making the revenue bill the unfinished business. Of course, when we finish the revenue bill then the immigration bill can be taken up, the Senate having expressed its will that it shall be acted upon at this session of Congress; but I trust that Senators will not vote for taking up this measure and thereby displace the revenue bill as the unfinished business.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, it was evident to every Member of this body that the immigration bill was going to be considered at this time. When the action was taken by my colleagues on this side I stated that I would reserve to myself the right, when I saw fit, to bring up the immigration bill. I have not brought it up for the purpose of retarding these necessary measures, but simply because I believe that a majority of the American people intend us to face this question honestly and fearlessly and decide what we are going to do about it.

A few months, as a matter of course, might not make any difference, but I do not propose to place myself in the category of using a great question in a manner in which it certainly should not be used at all. It is nonpartisan; Republicans and Democrats alike have voted in favor of this measure, and it has been vetoed alike by a Republican and a Democratic President. It has no partisan taint or phase about it. It has been debated in this Hall for years. The terms of the present bill, with the one exception referred to a moment ago, where we have constituted longitude and latitude in place of verbal expression, have been the same as the bill to-day. There are some modifications, but they are very slight. The House passed it overwhelmingly, and it occurred to me now that as we are hoping to get through as early as possible no debate is necessary, except by those who want to defeat the bill. I certainly do not propose to debate it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Has the Senator any reasonable hope that if we proceed to the consideration of this bill we will finish it to-day, and then we can proceed with the revenue bill?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. So far as I am concerned in charge of the bill, I want to make this statement in justification of my position: I am chairman of the committee and heartily in favor of the bill. I believe the American people want it and want it now, and I propose, as far as I have any influence, to give it to them now or let them know why. If those who are opposed to the bill want to stand up here and debate it and defeat it, it is their right; but we are all familiar with the terms of it, and I take it we are ready to vote upon it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I voted against the motion to proceed to the consideration of the immigration bill because the Democratic Party of the Senate decided in conference to postpone the matter until the next session. I believe in party solidarity and party teamwork. I was sent here by the Democracy of Texas to cooperate with the Democratic Party in the Senate. Being a Democrat, and having been elected as a Democrat, I intend to continue to do so.

I am thoroughly in favor of the immigration bill, and if in spite of my vote the Senate should vote to consider it I shall vote for it. If the President should veto it, I shall vote to pass it over his veto, as I have done in the past.

I say again, however, that in matters of party policy and party action I shall support the decisions of party conferences duly authorized and assembled, and I hope the moment will never come when I shall fail to do so.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from New Jersey will yield to me just a minute, I do not think there is any question of party loyalty or party solidarity involved here. I am perfectly willing to work with my party as I have done in the past until it comes to a question that I believe involves a principle and loyalty to those who intrusted me with the great responsibility of a Senatorship. I think there are others here who have failed to be bound from time to time when questions not involving politics but involving a principle were concerned. I take it that it is different when a principle involves my relations to a question which has confronted the people, and I have faced it under my responsibility to my people. I frankly stated to my colleagues that I could not and would not be bound on this question.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, my position on the immigration bill is, I think, very well known. I think the position of all Senators, especially those who were Members of this body in the last Congress, is well known. A very large majority of them are earnestly in favor of the enactment of the immigration bill.

On two occasions the question as to what measures should be taken up at the present session was brought before the Democratic conference and once or twice before the Democratic steering committee. The question of adjournment at a seasonable time was considered in connection with the question as to what measures should be taken up. There were certain measures that were regarded as imperatively necessary to be taken up. There were the ship-purchase bill, the appropriation bills, conference reports, the revenue bill, and two or three other bills that were designated. It was believed that the consideration of those bills would occupy the time of the Senate until the 1st of September, and for that reason it was decided by the Democratic steering committee and by the Democratic conference twice that as the immigration question was not so acute as it was two years ago before the commencement of the present deplorable war, the public interests would not suffer if it was permitted to go over until the first week in December. By a very large majority the Democratic conference decided that the immigration bill should go over and be made a special order for the first Monday in December. After that, by the unanimous vote of all present, the unanimous vote of 38 men, that action was declared to be binding party action, and that in face of the fact that five-sixths of the men who attended that conference were as warmly in favor of the immigration bill as the Senator from South Carolina or the Senator from Georgia or any other man.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KERN. In a moment. I might say something further on this subject, to the effect that no suggestion has ever come to me from the President of the United States that he had any desire that this bill should be postponed to any time. No suggestion has ever come from him to me on the subject except that he did not care to have the immigration bill tacked on to some other bill, so that it would put him in an attitude in which he might be called upon to veto a bill for which he stood in order to defeat a bill for which he did not stand.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KERN. I will not yield just at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana declines to yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. Very good.

Mr. KERN. We have here the question as to whether or not the party action shall be set aside. We have a question here as to whether we will set aside a bill that has been made the unfinished business of the Senate, a bill that is of the highest importance, a bill that must be passed, and take up the immigration bill, which will bring about a long discussion and which will indefinitely postpone the time of adjournment. It was because of a desire to economize time the action of the Democratic conference was taken. It was because of a similar desire—a desire that the solidarity of the Democratic Party in the Senate, which has never been broken but once, may be maintained. It is for that reason, I hope, the unfinished business, which is the very important measure now before the Senate, may be continued as the unfinished business.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I voted against taking up the immigration bill at this time for the reason stated by the Senator from Indiana. I understood that in our caucus we had definitely and finally agreed that the bill should not be taken up. But the decree of the Senate is otherwise; it has been taken up, and is before the Senate at this time.

Mr. KERN. I beg pardon; it is not before the Senate at this time.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I understood that the motion was carried.

Mr. KERN. The action of the Senate only put the measure before the Senate until the conclusion of the morning hour.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I believe it will be wiser and better that it shall go over until another session. But be that as it may, since the question has been brought up, I want to say very frankly I am not opposed to an immigration bill, but I am opposed to the bill in this form if the feature of it found in lines 16 and 19, on page 8, is retained:

All aliens over 16 years of age, physically capable of reading, who can not read the English language, or some other language or dialect, including Hebrew or Yiddish:

If that feature is to remain in the bill, then I am unqualifiedly and totally opposed to it. We are fond of boasting that this is the land of the free and the home of the brave. I feel that this literacy test is absolutely unjust and utterly un-American, and that there is no reason for it in the world. Many of our fathers would have been unable to have satisfied this test. I say the question whether a man can read or write is no evidence as to his desirability for citizenship. We call this land the home of the downtrodden. In the war, when you wanted men to stop Confederate bullets, you never stopped to inquire whether those men could read or write. That was not the question. The question was whether they were in good health and bore allegiance to the United States. You were ready to receive them then. Now, thank God, we have no war. We have a need for many millions upon the farms and fields of the country. They are crying for labor, and the question as to whether a man can read or write should have no consideration for a Democratic and American Congress.

If you want to bar out the agitators and the plotters against our Government, I say you will not bar them out by barring out your so-called illiterates or those who fail to pass your literacy test. Everyone of the designers and plotters against our Government, those who scheme anarchy and seek to ruin this fair Republic, can pass your literacy test and would pass the test in almost every college to which they might be presented.

I cut out of the paper some days ago a clipping which I want to present.

A man can be well schooled, a man can be highly educated, a man can have all the acquired graces of social and scholarly standards and be a loafer, an adventurer, a dangerous scoundrel. A man can be the noblest work of God because he is honest and not know how to write his own name—

We want honest men—

Men who come here for an honest purpose, with an honest heart, an honest mind, a conscientious purpose, and a willing hand—

We want honest men to be allowed to come into this country when they know how to work and are willing to work and are going to raise good sons and daughters who will know how to read and write. We don't want scoundrels, we don't want adventurers, we don't want loafers, if they have taken all the degrees of the finest universities of Europe.

We want immigration laws that will keep out the scoundrels—

Your law would let them in—

We want immigration laws that will keep out the scoundrels, the adventurers, and the loafers as surely as they will let in the honest men, to whom fortune, where they were born, never granted the opportunity of education, but who have the parental ambition and devotion which would have their children born and raised where for everybody, at least, preliminary education is as free as air.

God help this nation when it opens wide its door to the scoundrel who is educated but slams it in the face of a better man, by all the true standards of humanity, who never went to school.

I can picture in my mind and tell you the names of many men whose fathers I knew were absolutely and utterly illiterate, who carved their way in this splendid land and brought up splendid families, and who have acquired great wealth and perhaps honor in their respective communities. A blessing it is to read and to write, but I say in free democratic America, with our free public schools, honest, conscientious men, with true hearts and willing hands and Christian purposes, should be welcomed, whether they can read and write or not. Our public schools will assimilate them, and from them will come a progeny that will be a source of pride and admiration and glory to the Republic.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will vote "nay" on taking up the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if he thinks it is good policy for us to have compulsory-education laws in every State of the American Union and then admit a horde of ignorant people from southern Europe, those who have no education whatever?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. What are our schools for but to educate them? Of course, I believe in a public free-school education. I never had more than a little of it myself, but I am thankful for the little that I have. I believe in opening the doors to the hordes the Senator speaks of now. Mayhap the Senator's grandfather may have been of that horde. It may be that you may have counted my father, perhaps you might have counted my mother, among them.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is wrong about the grandfather of the Senator from New Hampshire. The great grandfather of the Senator from New Hampshire did come from Germany, but he was an educated man.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. But that does not satisfy my position. I say it would be the most unfortunate thing, utterly unjust and absolutely un-American, for Congress to apply this test as one of the reasons before an immigrant should land. The great cities of New York, and Jersey City, Newark, and Paterson, in my State, many of our hilltops, have been made to blossom as the rose by men who when they came here could not read and write. If the Senator from New Hampshire was more fortunate in those who came, I do not know that he is any better. I would not trade or barter or change a thousand of the population which makes up the great cities of Newark, Hoboken, Jersey City, and New York for the best city that may find itself within the boundary of New Hampshire, no matter what the Senator may claim for them. I say to you, my friends, in all the earnestness and seriousness of my nature—I do not speak in a partisan way but in the broad, general way—this is the most un-American and undemocratic proposition that could be proposed in a Congress of this Republic. As I said, I shall vote nay on this question.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I gave notice two or three days ago, under what I assumed to be the unwritten procedure of the Senate, that at the close of morning business to-day I should submit some remarks upon a subject somewhat foreign to the general line of the unfinished business. I had intended before the hour of 2 o'clock arrived to have submitted my remarks in accordance with that notice, and the fact that I have not been able to do so until now must be my explanation for addressing the Senate on the pending motion at this hour and upon a matter wholly foreign to it.

I may say, Mr. President, at the outset, that the sentiments I shall express upon the subject of the pending so-called Anthony amendment as a partisan issue are my own. I do not assume to speak either for the party to which I belong, for the President, or for any of my associates. My remarks upon this subject have been prompted by no suggestion from anyone and are made upon my own account solely.

Mr. President, the advocates of equal suffrage in America are sharply divided between those who demand the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution, forbidding the States to deny to women the right to vote and those who insist that the subject should be regulated and controlled by each State as it may desire. While this is a difference of procedure it has become irreconcilable.

The National Association for Equal Suffrage is the official head of the movement. It has always urged action in both directions, but preferably by national amendment. This policy is both wise and practical. It has advanced the amendment propaganda and has also secured favorable action by 12 of the States. On the other hand, the demand for a Federal amendment has been checked somewhat by a movement of recent origin which seeks to subordinate all political, social, moral, and economic problems to the adoption of a suffrage amendment to the Federal Constitution; a demand which, if continued, may indefinitely postpone if it does not defeat the accomplishment of the object desired.

With the exception of the Progressive Party, born of a great occasion, proclaiming a noble mission, and committed to a leadership which first betrayed and then assassinated it, no great political party has indorsed woman suffrage by Federal amendment. The last declaration of the Democratic and Republican Parties, both made in June of the current year, though differing in language, are identical in substance. I give them both:

DEMOCRATIC.

We recommend the extension of the franchise to the women of the country by the States upon the same terms as to men.

REPUBLICAN.

The Republican Party reaffirming its faith in government of the people, by the people, for the people, as a measure of justice to one-half the adult people of the country, favors the extension of the suffrage to women, but recognizes the right of each State to settle this question for itself.

No reasonable man will deny that these declarations commit their respective supporters to the principle of equal suffrage to be secured by State action only. Good party men will so construe them. And so construed, they will accept them. Candidates, and especially national candidates, can not do otherwise and be consistent with their party principles.

But, Mr. President, we live in an age of science and of surprises. Solomon said there was nothing new under the sun; but we encounter many novelties in these twentieth century days notwithstanding. The most recent one embodies the career of the Republican Party from June 7 to August 2, 1916. Within that brief interval it met in convention, rejected the active candidacies of half a dozen able and anxious aspirants, selected a cloistered hermit for its presidential nominee, of whose views it knew nothing and largely because it knew nothing, and cared less. In turn the nominee threw his robes to the winds, accepted the nomination by indorsing his party platform in a brief opinion of 8,000 words, and within the next 24 hours rejected one of its planks and substituted his own for that of his party. His reason for this somewhat unusual performance was quite as unique as the action itself. Prompt and favorable consideration of the suffrage amendment will, in his opinion, end all agitation of the subject.

Mr. President, if Justice Hughes believes this to be good for the suffrage question, he should not limit the application of the rule. Why should he not have given his approval to the tumultuous candidacy of Col. Roosevelt, whose clamor for the restoration of the crown is quite as persistent and almost as old as that which Mr. Hughes would end by accepting?

But I think there were other and more plausible reasons for this performance. The Republican Party is without an issue, as it is without a policy and without intelligent leadership. Its choice was not Mr. Hughes. It had the alternative of accepting him or surrendering to the Christian soldier of Armageddon.

Having acted upon conditions it could not control, the party is striving painfully to gather strength for the contest. Its nominee has accepted the counsel of St. Paul. He is all things to all men. He will, therefore, make issues for himself where he can, and his party can accept them or remain with the platform, as it chooses. He asked for no nomination. The banner was forced into his reluctant hands, and so he will wave it as he wills.

But, Mr. President, this seemingly spontaneous utterance of an impulsive soul was well staged and confidently foretold. The ground was cleared for it long since, and the performance would doubtless have taken place with other actors had Mr. Hughes been left to his peaceful surroundings.

I have no doubt that the Congressional Union was originally organized to promote the cause of woman suffrage. It may be further conceded that this is still a largely controlling purpose.

But if one may judge an association by its acts it may be as safely affirmed that side by side with this purpose is the desire to secure Republican supremacy in national affairs through the agency of class organization and control. The Congressional Union has been militant for suffrage and against the Democratic Party ever since it came into being. The pretense for this action is not even plausible. Democracy is in power. It does not respond to the union demand, therefore destroy it. Its membership, like that of its adversary, is divided as to suffrage, therefore fight it tooth and nail everywhere, particularly in the equal-suffrage States. Funds are needed to finance all movements. Republicans can furnish them as needed, and will do so provided their use can be beneficial to Republican purposes. Could anything be simpler?

In 1914 a vote was taken in the Senate upon the suffrage amendment. Thirty-five votes were cast for it. Of these 21 were Republican and 14 were Democratic. Thirty-four votes were cast against it. Of these 12 were Republican and 21 were Democratic. The division was almost at right angles to party lines. The same may be said of the membership of the committee, where the sentiment, with the sole exception of the Republican Senator from New Mexico, is in one direction. But this seems to have been sufficient reason for Congressional Union animosity to Democracy, whose alliance with the Republican Party has since been practically unconcealed.

In 1914 it waged a dear little campaign of its own in the suffrage States. It scratched every Democratic face, whether suffragist or not, and beamed approvingly upon every Republican candidate, whether suffragist or otherwise. After the election it shouted victory in shrill cresendo over every Democrat who lost, and waved its little sling which threw the golden pebble which felled the Democratic Goliath. Indeed it partially convinced itself, and possibly its political sponsor, that it had "started something." But this was an essential policy, since its apparent importance must be a continuing quantity lest the sources of its spring run dry.

Since then the understanding has been unbroken. The clamor for a woman's party synchronized with the activities of the Republican Party. "Four million woman votes" would be massed for the party first bidding for them. Funds were being raised for the cause and the preliminaries of mobilization were under way. The preliminary powwow of the Congressional Union, culminating in a proposed convention for August, was held in Chicago simultaneously with the Republican convention and the Progressive obsequies.

The conventions ended and the scenes shifted to New York. Perhaps it was merely a coincidence that Col. Roosevelt should have administered the coup de grace to his faithful Bull Moose on June 26 by sounding one of those bugle calls that always means retreat; that Mr. Hughes should have officially indorsed his party platform on July 31 and repudiated a portion of it immediately afterwards, and that this apostasy should have been the signal for the raising of large campaign funds for the nascent woman's party. But it would seem to be the development of a prearranged program.

The New York Times of Sunday, August 6, contained this paragraph:

Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont went to Newport yesterday to get contributions to the woman's party campaign fund of $500,000. She will make appeals to 1,000 wealthy women. The $500,000 is to be used in organizing the women voters of the country against the reelection of Woodrow Wilson.

Here is a consummation of that program. Mr. Hughes becomes the advocate of the Anthony amendment because it will be an asset to the Republican Party. The huge sum of $500,000 can be raised because of it for the corruption of the voters of 11 States. Its volume is an indication of its purpose. No party can expend that sum honestly in behalf of any political movement among their limited population, and certainly not for the mere "organization of women voters."

Everything in this day, Mr. President, must have the curse or the blessing of the distinguished director of human destiny. Mr. Roosevelt has, therefore, given this program his benediction. He could not have nestled Mr. Hughes under the shadow of his always extended pinions and withheld his approval of the new crusade. For aught I know, the suggestion may have been his own.

And since everything the kaleidoscopic colonel does is at the time the one important thing in all the universe, his indorsement of it must be superlative. Listen to his announcement of August 8:

DEAR MISS CARPENTER: In answer to your question, I take pleasure in saying that I welcome the formation of an organization, especially organized in the suffrage States, to secure the passage of the Federal amendment.

The time is ripe for the passage of the amendment. There is a more widespread demand for it than for the passage of any recent constitutional amendment. Twelve States have already enfranchised women without producing to even the smallest degree any of the evils prophesied. The women in those 12 States should certainly use this ballot on behalf of their sisters in the other States. Such action is precisely like that of the men who use their ballots to force the abolition of child labor, the passage of workmen's compensation laws, the adoption of a protective tariff, for the enactment of legislation to secure the military and naval preparedness, which is vital to the very existence of the Nation.

It is absurd to stigmatize one movement as "blackmail" unless the other movements are also stigmatized as blackmail. As for "sex antagonism," that is due to the men who discriminate against women purely because of sex, and not to the women who seek to do away with such discrimination. The special women's organizations should act in this matter as men (and women) do in the movements for national defense. They should not pardon misconduct or mischievous and wrong-headed attitude in a public man merely because he is right on this question, but they should make his attitude on this question the consideration of primary importance.

Mr. Hughes has unequivocally taken the right position, and, as regards all other positions, he, and not his opponent, is entitled to the support of both men and women, and therefore the women in the enfranchised States who do not in this election support him forfeit the right to say they have done their utmost for their sisters in the nonenfranchised States.

Very truly, yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

"The time is ripe for the passage of the amendment." "They"—the women—"should not pardon misconduct or mischievous and wrong-headed attitude in a public man merely because he is right on this question, but they should make his attitude on this question the consideration of primary importance."

Being the present question of primary importance with the great explorer, navigator, hunter, soldier, statesman, orator, and major general in embryo, mark the anathema:

Mr. Hughes has unequivocally taken the right position, and as regards all other positions he, and not his opponent, is entitled to the support of both men and women, and therefore the women in the enfranchised States who do not in this election support him forfeit the right to say they have done their utmost for their sisters in the nonenfranchised States.

There you have it. The so-called Anthony amendment is the supreme issue. It is of primary importance. Mr. Hughes has monopolized it. If the enfranchised woman does not support him without regard to other issues, she is a weakling, a mollycoddle, and possibly a Sopothete.

Where are the things of yesterday? Where are the monopolists and the criminal rich, the bosses and their invisible government? Where are the demands of social and industrial justice? What has become of the crime and the criminals of 1912? Where now are Belgium and the Lusitania? Where is preparedness, with its fleets and standing armies, the hyphenates, and the specter of Japan? Gone! They are of exparamount consideration. The colonel has worn them to a frazzle. He now has other baubles. The River of Doubt and the whiskered bird have been supplanted by the Anthony amendment. It is the primary issue, and the colonel indorses it with

Mr. Hughes as he once indorsed tariff revision with Mr. Taft. To-morrow, next day, perhaps, some other mote will cross his vision and be in turn magnified into heroic proportions. With him primary problems "crowd each other's heels so fast they follow."

The Congressional Union, equipped with Mr. Hughes's approval and Col. Roosevelt's benediction, met at Colorado Springs on schedule time and rechristened itself the Woman's Party. It stayed a moment's hesitation over its prearranged program and then took the plunge. This is its platform:

Whereas the present administration under President Wilson and the Democratic Party have persistently opposed the passage of a national suffrage amendment; and

Whereas each of the other national parties, either by their platform or through their candidates, are pledged to the passage of a Federal amendment enfranchising women: Therefore be it

Resolved, First, that the National Woman's Party, so long as the opposition of the Democratic Party continues, pledges itself to use its best efforts in the 12 States where women vote for President to defeat the Democratic candidate for President, and in the 11 States where women vote for Members of Congress to defeat the candidates of the Democratic Party for Congress.

Resolved, Second, that we congratulate the Progressive, Prohibition, and Socialist Parties upon the definite stand which they have taken in their indorsement of suffrage for women by national action.

Resolved, Third, that we commend the position of the Republican candidate for President, Charles Evans Hughes, for the unequivocal stand which he has taken for human liberty by his indorsement of suffrage for women by national action, and assure him of our appreciation of his statesmanlike position.

The preamble begins and closes with a misstatement. The Democratic Party has not persistently or at all opposed the passage of the amendment. The President has done nothing about it, and properly so. The Republican Party has not persistently or otherwise advocated the passage of the amendment. Both parties have given little heed to the subject. The components of both differ broadly regarding it.

The preamble proceeds with the declaration that—

Each of the other parties, either by their platforms or through their candidates, are pledged to the passage of the amendment.

This is true only if a party nominee can by fiat ex cathedra change and reconstruct its official declarations as he may please. If he can do so, a party platform is worse than meaningless. It is a method of deception and changes with the view of the man whose confession of faith it is designed to be.

Has the Republican Party come to this? Has its committee or its membership accepted Mr. Hughes ipse dixit regarding the amendment or Col. Roosevelt's assertion of its primary importance? Has a single Republican Senator heretofore unfriendly to the amendment changed his attitude toward it because or since Mr. Hughes has done so? I challenge every one of them to answer this question affirmatively. On the contrary, I have some reason to know that the pronouncement of Mr. Hughes has only served to stiffen the hostility of some of them, if, indeed, it has not aroused some resentment toward himself. And I am very sure that a similar announcement by the President would produce that effect on this side of the Chamber. And I suspect that were a vote taken upon the amendment to-day the ayes would be less than it would have commanded on the 31st of July.

Mr. President, the amendment never had many friends on this floor, as the preceding one had in the last Congress. And the decrease is distributed upon both sides of the Chamber. I have it on good authority that the same is true of the House. With regard to Democratic defection, the reason is obvious. Some Senators and Representatives were opposed by the Congressional Union at the last election regardless of their suffrage views. It now proposes to defeat other Democrats who were suffragists before most of the union leaders were born. And all of them have good memories. They have political friends also. The union complains bitterly of the nonaction of the House Judiciary Committee regarding the amendment. Are they so ignorant of human nature that they can not perceive the reason?

The Congressional Union also denounces Senate Democrats, because the amendment is still on the calendar. So far as I am aware, the only effort to secure its consideration outside of my own came from the national association. The officials of the union last June requested postponement of any action until they should request it, and the request has never been made, of me at least.

Mr. President, I digress for a moment in order to read the letter of Miss Anne H. Martin, legislative chairman, of date of 30th of June last, and addressed to me as chairman of the Senate Committee on Woman Suffrage. The letter reads:

We understand that a meeting of Senators from the suffrage States has been held, and that there has been some discussion of bringing the national suffrage amendment to a vote at an early date. The amendment is known as Senate joint resolution No. 1, and is Order No. 27 on the Senate calendar.

The Congressional Union is not yet ready for a vote on this amendment, and we write to ask you to oppose any effort which may be made for an early vote. We earnestly request that no move at all be made for a vote in the Senate without consultation with the Congressional Union on this subject.

Thanking you for your cooperation, I am,

Very sincerely, yours, ANNE H. MARTIN, Legislative Chairman.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What is the date of the letter?

Mr. THOMAS. It is dated June 30 last and appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page 11417. I introduced it on the 5th of July, prompted to do so on account of certain very discourteous interruptions of the President of the United States during the delivery of a speech on the 4th of July on the occasion of the dedication, I think, of the new building belonging to the American Federation of Labor.

In that connection, Mr. President, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD, without stopping to read it, a letter from Mrs. Helen H. Gardener with regard to the incident referred to, this lady being one of the leading advocates and one of the officers of the national association.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

JULY 6, 1916.

No one more sincerely regrets, deprecates, and opposes the heckling of the President by the militant, English branch of the suffragists than do the real suffragists of America who have carried the woman-suffrage banner with dignity and good sense from the early days to its splendid showing of complete triumph in 12 States and its promise of very early success in several others.

The bringing to America of these methods of threat and force by this handful of young women who were trained by Mrs. Pankhurst in England, and who got their first taste of publicity through their jail sentences in London, is quite as shocking to the taste and judgment of the great body of suffragists in the United States as it is to other people of dignity and propriety.

Some of the leaders of this new "Woman's Party" and Congressional Union are thirsting for martyrdom. They yearn to so place themselves as to be arrested. They want to accomplish the ends of justice by force and threat instead of by education and evolution as has ever been the method, as is to-day the method, of the National American Woman Suffrage Association and of the hundreds of thousands of steady, earnest, sane suffrage workers, both men and women, all over America.

To import at this late date from England these tactics of violence and threat, of heckling and bad breeding, is wholly out of character with American ideals, is entirely unnecessary and absolutely the worst influence that could be injected into the woman-suffrage movement at this date, when it is marching triumphantly to success.

The men and women of America have come to thinking seriously and with a fair amount of intelligence on this subject. The leaven of suffrage placed, without violence and with grasp and good will, so many years ago by Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, and their associates is rapidly leavening the whole country. The trend of the times is carrying this movement forward with dignity and power.

To inject into the movement this note of violence and threat at this late date is to degrade the whole movement to the status of brawlers instead of leaving it, where it has always been in America, with a clean, lofty record won by brain power and high ideals instead of by squabbling, threats, and shrieks.

At the present time these young women are threatening the party in power with 4,000,000 women's votes.

They can't "deliver the goods."

Those of us who are much in the suffrage States know that the women of those States, the leaders, resent any such assumption.

These women say that they will not leave their party affiliations and vote against men whom they know and trust and believe in in order to punish a political party for not believing as those men believe.

It is not human nature for them to do so; and, above all, it is not woman nature, thank God, to punish the innocent nor to wantonly destroy her friends in order to hurt somebody else.

This is precisely what the Congressional Union urges the western women to do and claims that they will do. They sent speakers and workers into California, Colorado, and other States to try to defeat Senator CHAMBERLAIN, Senator THOMAS, Representatives TAYLOR and RAKER and others who have always been among the strongest friends of suffrage, who stood for it valiantly long before these English militants were ever heard of, yet these women went out to destroy these men politically not because of their own misdeeds or shortcomings but because these men had not so far been able to carry a majority of the other men of their party into the suffrage ranks.

Had these men been defeated, their successors would have been of a political party which also has "failed to see the light" as a party, although in power very much longer than the present one.

What would have been gained by defeating their very best friends?

Nobody knows. Let us suppose that the new, untried men had come in and the old friendly ones been defeated. What then?

Now begins a new period of threats against the old friends in the new party in power unless they made (in their first session) everybody in their party believe on this subject and vote as they did, no matter what the constituents of those new men might have dictated or wished.

The Congressional Union would now go out and try to defeat Senators SMOOT, SUTHERLAND, BORAH, CURTIS, and other good suffragists because their political party had not voted as a party on this topic as these men have voted and worked for many years past, even when woman suffrage was far more unpopular with their constituents and colleagues than it is to-day.

The voting women of the West, of whom I am one, will not be led into any such unfair, un-American conduct. Having just returned from the West, I know that the real leaders there resent any such idea and tactics and deplore the thrusting of these methods into the suffrage movement in this country.

HELEN H. GARDENER.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, last month I sought permission to call the amendment up for a record vote, and I encountered the instant and persistent opposition of this organization. In view of the Colorado Springs resolution, the purpose of this opposition is now obvious.

Mr. President, the new woman's party is nothing but a Republican campaign club. It will not disturb Democrats either in or out of the suffrage States. It claims the allegiance of a few Democratic women, but they can be Democrats no longer if they subscribe to the resolutions I have read. I know that the Democratic women of my State repudiated the Congressional Union long ago. At the April convention they successfully opposed the request of that body for a hearing before the resolutions committee. Our Democratic women are too well grounded in the faith to join such a movement. They are too deeply devoted to the cause of suffrage to put it to the hazard of a class crusade. They are organized with the men voters and are content. They can not look to Newport for revenue, but such revenues can not corrupt their allegiance to Democracy. And they repudiate the pretense that their votes can be controlled by junketers from Washington or Newport for any cause or any candidate except their own.

Mr. President, I ask leave here to insert in the RECORD, without reading, an extract from the Washington Star of August 17, being an announcement of the receipt by the White House of telegrams from many western women declaring it their purpose to support him without regard to the so-called woman's party.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The extract referred to is as follows:

PRESIDENT'S CANDIDACY PROMISED WOMEN'S AID—TELEGRAMS INDICATED THAT ALL FEMININE VOTERS ARE NOT ALIGNED AGAINST HIM.

The White House is gratified over the receipt of telegrams from many western women declaring it to be their purpose to support President Wilson despite the difference in his attitude toward woman suffrage and that of Charles E. Hughes, the Republican candidate. The telegrams have been reaching the White House since the gathering of the woman's party in Denver and the declaration of that organization to fight the President.

A long telegram has reached the White House from Colorado Springs, Colo., signed by 21 prominent women of that city, assuring the President they would not sacrifice other principles because of the difference between his position and that of Mr. Hughes.

"We are emphatically opposed to the purpose expressed by the recently organized woman's party to unite the women of the equal-suffrage States in an effort to accomplish your defeat and reinstate in power the party which for 50 years has turned a deaf ear to the cause of equal suffrage," the telegram says.

Mr. THOMAS. Such, Mr. President, is the attitude of women in the other suffrage States. I am in receipt of a letter from Hon. Mary Bellamy, of Laramie, Wyo., vice president of the National Council of Women Voters, dated August 2, 1916, who says:

MY DEAR SENATOR: You will greatly oblige the western women by having the inclosed marked passage from Cheyenne Tribune read into the Congressional Union.

I think the lady meant the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The National Council of Women Voters has in membership leading Republicans, Democrats, Socialists, and Prohibitionists, and resents that any person or party makes claim to controlling our vote.

We are as independent as the male voter, and hope, through the educational work of the council, to become even better informed than the average male voter.

Very sincerely, MARY G. BELLAMY.

This lady is well known to the Senators from Wyoming, both of whom will, I am sure, unqualifiedly indorse her standing and her right to speak upon the subject from ripe experience and observation.

I have also received from Mrs. Bellamy a clipping from the Cheyenne Tribune of July 28, making reference to the subject, which, with the permission of the Senate, I will insert without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The clipping referred to is as follows:

[By Agnes Wright.]

By the adoption of a resolution by the National Council of Women Voters, Cheyenne is practically assured of a $50,000 equal-suffrage monument. For some time the members of this organization have been securing drawings and specifications for a monument to represent a beautiful woman, the monument typifying the sincerity and purity of a perfect woman. The chief purpose in selecting such a monument will be to use it as a symbol of equal suffrage and to eliminate the numerous caricatures which appear in press.

The national council had considered placing this monument in Washington, D. C., but instead have adopted a resolution recommending that the monument be placed at Cheyenne, as nearly as possible on the spot where equal suffrage was granted for the first time in the United States.

The resolution as it appears reads:

"To the National Council of Women Voters, assembled at Cheyenne, Wyo., July 27, 1916:

"The women of Wyoming respectfully ask your earnest consideration of the proposition to place the monument representing the enfranchised women of the United States in the city of Cheyenne, Wyo., justly called the cradle of the citizen woman.

"GRACE RAYMOND HEBARD.
"MARY BELLAMY.
"FRANCIS CLARK.
"KATHERINE MORTON."

The resolution was adopted by a rising vote, which was unanimous. The funds for the monument will be raised by the national council, and the work will be placed in the hands of splendid artists, who are now working on designs.

The cooperation of the national council with the National Woman's Suffrage Association has been assured by the acceptance of the invitation extended to the council by the association. In forming such an alliance it is distinctly understood that each association preserves its own individuality and independence, and that the basis of the alliance be the joint object of the two national bodies—the extension of equal suffrage by nonpartisan methods.

These two organizations are absolutely opposed to militant methods and desire and thoroughly believe that they may win their object by educational methods instead of by the hatchet. They are opposed to the Congressional Union and all similar organizations. Such acts as the interruptions of the speech of President Wilson by a suffragette which occurred recently are far beneath the scope of the National Council of Women Voters and are not to be countenanced. They believe that by training women in citizenship the time will come when they will be given full recognition.

Mr. THOMAS. This editorial, Mr. President, appears in the New York Times of August 12 regarding the party in Nevada:

A PARTY OF LEADERS.

The first national conference of the mysterious woman's party is in solemn session at Colorado Springs. "The party will place no ticket in the field," says its chairman. "The leaders agree," a dispatch from the seat of council tells us, "that the best plan to get the passage of the (woman suffrage) amendment is to throw their support to the party most favorable." Is the woman's party all leaders? Has it any followers? Is it anything more than a delightfully busy and magniloquent coterie? The Carson City Appeal shows this daughter of the Congressional Union for Woman Suffrage in all its mighty youth. A woman from Detroit and a woman from Chicago came to Reno the last week in July and began to form the woman's party in Nevada, a suffrage State. They seem to think that a party consists of a State committee, county committees, and so on, a machine without voters. The Appeal even doubts if the material of a skeleton organization can be found in Nevada.

This is the quotation from the Nevada paper:

As far as Nevada is concerned, the leaders of the woman's party will have a hard time in finding timber to complete a State organization. When two dozen or more representatives of the Congressional Union toured the State some weeks ago they were greeted courteously, but not enthusiastically, and here in the capital city it was impossible to find even one woman to serve on a reception committee to meet them at the station. Ladies with autos were willing to escort them to all points of interest, but when it came to being identified with the Congressional Union, Carson women, one and all, side-stepped.

The Nevada women who worked and fought for woman's suffrage for so many years stand almost as a unit against the "militant wing," and the women who did not ardently desire the right of suffrage, but who, since it has been thrust upon them, intend to exercise the privilege for the best interest of the State and Nation, will not be dictated to in their choice of parties and measures.

Is the woman's party correspondingly strong in the other suffrage States?

I might, Mr. President, digress for a moment to ask to introduce into the RECORD, without reading, a letter bearing date of August 9 to Senator PITTMAN and signed by Grace Mahan, writing for the Congressional Union, and giving to the Senator—who has been one of the most earnest and most consistent advocates of woman suffrage in the West, and who did as much, perhaps, to secure the right of women to vote in his own State as any other man in it—the reasons why they can not vote for him now and why they will support his opponent, who, so far as I know, has never been prominently conspicuous in the indorsement of suffrage to women. In saying that I do not wish to cast any undue reflection whatever upon Mr. Platt, because, for aught I know, he may be an advocate of woman suffrage and may have voted for it. He can not, however, have done more for it than the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter referred to by the Senator from Colorado will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

RENO, NEV., August 9, 1916.

HON. KEY PITTMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Replying to your letter to "The women of Nevada," in which you state that you realize "that you are entitled to know the position of your representatives upon every subject so that you may advise and criticize freely," I should like to advice you that the question before the Democratic convention was this, "Will you indorse the Susan B. Anthony amendment, granting national suffrage to all women?" You did not urge the adoption of this national amendment. We women of Nevada, still nationally disenfranchised, are far more interested in what you did not do for us at St. Louis than we are in the suffrage speeches which you claim to have made during the campaigns of 1910, 1912, and 1914. Of these latter we seem to have no recollection nor record.

The speech which you did make before the Democratic convention was merely a speech for creating suffrage sentiment. The time to have made such a speech on behalf of Nevada women was back in 1912, during your campaign. We needed that help then. Now when we need national suffrage we do not propose to support a Senator who will begin to talk for national suffrage four years after the amendment shall have been passed.

As your letter suggests, your "general attitude upon the suffrage question" is known to us. It is unmistakably set forth in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD (1914), where your vote upon the Anthony amendment in the Senate stands "No," in spite of the fact that up to the time the vote was taken you had assured us that you would vote in favor of the amendment.

Yours, truly, GRACE MAHAN.

Mr. THOMAS. I could adduce similar testimony from other suffrage States if time permitted, but I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. President, if this party hews to the line of its platform—which I presume its candidates can change, if they wish, precisely as Mr. Hughes has changed his—it will furnish a spectacle for gods and men.

Speaking of Mr. Hughes, Mr. President, I notice that in his Spokane speech he receded somewhat from his New York announcement, indicating that he is perhaps not so sure of the political benefit proceeding from his astonishing utterance as when he made it. He said:

> While I did not propose to attempt to add, and could not add, to the platform of my party, I stated my personal conviction that the amendment should be submitted and ratified.

I need not say that this explanatory statement has caused much fluttering and agitation in the woman's party dovecote. The Union says it will oppose every Democratic suffragist and support every Republican nonsuffragist. In Kansas it will try to defeat the first Democratic woman ever nominated for Congress by trying to elect her opponent. And it will work hand in hand with men like the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, a fact which will point a moral, though it may not adorn a tale.

In 1914 this Senator was anxious for a reelection. He had what seemed a fight upon his hands. His State had given its electoral vote to the Progressive candidate in 1912. He needed votes, and as many as he could gather. In casting around for them he bethought himself of the pending suffrage amendment. Thereupon he focused all the resources of his intellect upon it and found it good. On March 19, 1914, a vote was taken upon it. The Senator, strangely enough, was not in his seat. But when his name was called his colleague rose and said, "My colleague is necessarily absent. If he were present to-day he would vote 'yea.'" This announcement was received with rapture.

The election came in due season, and the Senator was returned. Some time afterwards it must have occurred to him that there might be another side to the cause of suffrage which in his arduous days of campaigning had been overlooked. That he might properly discharge the functions of his high position it doubtless behooved him to ascertain if that were so.

He therefore made a second and postelection study of the problem and found it bad. He can not, therefore, in conscience cast his vote for the amendment again. He will make atonement for his past error, therefore, by voting to reject it. But since Mr. Hughes has announced his conversion this little lapse from the true path of the Pennsylvania Senator may be overlooked and the woman's party will aid him in his struggle against the Pennsylvania democracy. I wonder if Mr. Hughes will imitate the example of his supporter and after the election is over do a little further investigation. He will have ample leisure for the purpose.

On the other hand, the Senators from Arizona and Nevada, lifelong suffragists, who aided in securing to the women of their States the right to vote, will be fought by the woman's party because the President will not reject his party platform and turn the Executive offices over to the women for the promotion of an issue which just now is of minor importance. What better illustration can I give of this foolish and wholly indefensible policy?

If either of the great parties had squarely indorsed the amendment, the support of that party by women suffragists and organizations would have been logical, consistent, and defensible. Neither has done so. Both have made the same declaration regarding it. The selection of one in preference to the other under such circumstances will inevitably drive that other into an opposition that will become the more formidable as the campaign advances.

I apprehend this fact will find demonstration in those States which vote directly upon suffrage at the ensuing election. Democrats will be more than human if in these States they should not retaliate, whatever their preferences or prejudices. I would not counsel it. I would deplore it. But I perceive a situation which may make it inevitable.

In things fundamental the Democratic Party is and must always be grounded. In things relating to procedure or to transient issues its platform expressions define and limit or enlarge the party position. To such determinations all good Democrats cheerfully subscribe, since the collective decision of a convention of chosen delegates, clothed with the authority of their constituencies, must be better than the variant and conflicting currents of individual judgment. The President has respected and will respect this view with regard to all subjects upon which his party has definitely spoken, and will in turn receive renewed expression of the public confidence in his wisdom, his integrity, and his devotion to public duty.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is not necessary for me to take the time of the Senate to inform it of my view and my position on the question of woman suffrage. I have been an advocate of woman suffrage for the last 25 years, and am still a believer in the cause. I have been an opponent of the so-called Anthony amendment, and am still so, and expect to remain so until the close of my political career.

I am not going now to state the reasons why I am opposed to the Anthony amendment, because I have stated them on the floor of the Senate pretty fully heretofore, and they are well understood and in no sense are they modified by any present conditions or exigencies. But the Senator from Colorado takes issue with Gov. Hughes because, as he charges, he changed his platform or modified the platform or added to it by his individual expression of opinion. That certainly can not be a subject matter of great moment to the Democrats in this campaign. It can not be possible that our Democratic friends are going to criticize anyone for having expressed views contrary to the platform upon which he assumed to run.

This must be said for the Republican candidate and it is of deep significance, and that is that he declared his position before the election and not afterwards. We have a precedent in the one-term plank, and we have a precedent in the free-tolls plank. The only difference between the two cases—that of the distinguished President and that of the distinguished candidate for President—is that in the one instance the change took place after the election, and in the other instance the change took place before the election. Mr. Hughes takes the voters into his confidence; he tells them in advance of the election and at a time when they usually withhold, if they choose, their approval, just what his position is. He does not sail into office on solemn pledges and when it is too late for the voter to change his attitude disregard the pledges upon which he was elected.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. Is there not another difference—that in one instance the change was calculated to lose votes to the man who made it, and in the other instance the change was calculated to gain votes, referring now to the Panama Canal tolls example?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know whether that is true or not. In my judgment Gov. Hughes stands to lose more votes than he will gain, and that he acted from conviction.

Mr. HUGHES. I think the Senator does. I am willing to take his judgment on it.

Mr. BORAH. In my opinion in no sense would that apply to the one-term plank.

Mr. HUGHES. Well, I cited the other.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. I will express my views, if the Senator desires, as far as the one-term plank is concerned. I do not want to interrupt the Senator. I will state them if he will permit me.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I have always wanted to know about that.

Mr. HUGHES. I happened to be presiding over the convention at the time the platform was adopted; and one delegate, representing three or four, came to me and asked me what the parliamentary status was and what they could do with reference to the one-term plank, and asked me what my judgment of it was. I had heard it hurriedly read by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], who, as the Senator knows, reads in a low tone of voice. I gave it as my opinion that the one-term plank did not apply to the present situation. That was my opinion then, and that is my opinion now. That is the opinion that is held by nearly every member of our party to whom I have spoken. Of course, what the Republicans think about it is a matter to which we are more or less indifferent.

Mr. BORAH. I think if the Senator will read the language of the one-term plank he will see that it could not have that interpretation. I doubt not that the Senator was under that impression at the time he gave the statement, from having heard the plank inadequately read; but a rereading of it upon the part of the Senator, I think, will change his view.

But, Mr. President, the second charge against Mr. Hughes is that this was a matter of political expediency, and that is the view that seems to be entertained by the Senator from New Jersey—that Mr. Hughes changed his mind because of the political expediency, or, rather, that he added to the platform because of political expediency. If that is an issue in this campaign, we can also meet that proposition by worthy precedents. Assuming for the sake of the argument that the Senator is correct, are our Democratic friends in a position to urge that issue?

There is no one upon that side of the Chamber who speaks with more authority and with greater political acumen than the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. Every one knows that as a political leader he is an exceedingly astute and close observer. He does not speak at random. After the plank had been adopted at St. Louis, Mr. STONE was interviewed on the matter, and he said:

I do not think the vote on the suffrage plank reflects the opinion of the delegates. They took the attitude that the men they had selected to draft the platform believed the plank was proper, and voted for it. It was a matter of political expediency.

There is the construction which was placed upon the platform adopted at St. Louis in a few minutes thereafter by a gentleman who had as much to do with the shaping of political affairs at St. Louis, perhaps, as any other one man, and I suspect more than any other one man. "It was adopted," said the distinguished Senator, "as a matter of political expediency"; and whether you choose to make the issue that of modifying the platform or that of political expediency, according to your own record you are not in a position to criticize in regard to such actions.

But there is more. Gov. Ferguson, in an interview, said:

The majority plank is not the belief nor the conviction of the Democratic Party, and in the desire to secure a little political advantage this fatal surrender of Democratic principles is made. The crux of the whole situation is that we were told if we did not adopt the majority proposal that we might lose three or four Western States.

Now, if it should be true, my friends, that Mr. Hughes modified his views or added to the platform, as contended—and I am assuming now for the sake of the argument which you make, and not the truth in fact—and that it was for political expediency, upon the statement of the distinguished Senator from Missouri and the able leader from Texas for what reason was the plank inserted in the platform at St. Louis other than that of political expediency, and through the fear that possibly you might sacrifice the electoral vote in some of the Western States?

Furthermore, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], in speaking from the platform, interpreting the suffrage plank, said:

He [the President] believed it vital to his success that it stay there.

Success; yes, success! One-term plank may have come under that principle. This is only another expression which emphasizes the proposition that it was put into the platform for the same reason for which the Senator from Colorado charges that the distinguished candidate for President added it to the Republican platform.

Mr. President, so far as I am individually concerned, I do not believe it added to the political strength of the candidate upon the Republican ticket to have made the declaration that he did make. I do not believe it has added one particle of strength to the platform as a vote-getting proposition; and I am disposed to believe, therefore, that it was his sincere expression with reference to this proposition. I differ with him entirely. I do not believe in the Anthony amendment. I do not believe in the principle upon which it is founded. I believe we should have fought it out through the States, and I believe it will ultimately come through the States. I could not for party's sake or for any other reason change my view. It is fundamental with me. But there are those, such as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and other distinguished leaders, some upon that side of the Chamber, including, I think, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], who do believe in the Anthony amendment, and believe that it will ultimately and more quickly work out for the benefit of woman suffrage.

If that be true, what right have you to say that a man who takes the people into his confidence before the election is not speaking with the same sincerity?

It is entirely different, Mr. President, than if Mr. Hughes had made his campaign upon the platform and changed his position with reference to the platform thereafter. The people now understand his position. Those against woman suffrage are in a position to oppose him if they see fit. His attitude is known to the world, and with entire candor he has stated it weeks and weeks and even months in advance of the time when the people shall record their disapproval or their approval of his position.

To my mind, Mr. Hughes's declaration could not have been actuated by other than a sincere conviction as to the proper way to settle the question. As I say, while I differ with him, I do not believe that any one, in view of the time at which he has made the statement, can challenge the sincerity of purpose with which he made it. I call you to bear in mind that the States in which women vote are almost certainly Republican. They are among the least doubtful States for Republicans. The States where they have voted against suffrage, some of them are doubtful. So my judgment is that Justice Hughes saw here a great question and with his usual courage and clearness of purpose declared his position, and did so at a time when it was impossible for him to deceive a single voter.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is not any question but that in one sense every plank put in a platform is for political purposes, and indirectly for the purpose of getting votes, of course. It is for the purpose of letting the voters know what you stand for. It is undoubtedly true that occasions will and may arise when a party is justified in changing its pledges in a platform; but the question is with regard to the sincerity of a candidate accepting a nomination upon a platform.

It may be true that President Wilson, long after the adoption of a platform, has contended that the provisions have either become obsolete or inappropriate under changed conditions; but, mind you, what are the conditions surrounding the attitude of Mr. Hughes? It is not a question particularly of changing his mind; it is a question of consistency, which the people who favor suffrage have a right to consider.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire will state it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I left the Chamber, of necessity, a little while ago when the immigration bill was under consideration. I wish to inquire if that bill is now under consideration?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the chair has been absent, but he understands that the pending motion is a motion to take up the immigration bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. It had been taken up before I left the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was before 2 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. Something must have happened to it.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thank the Senator for calling attention to the matter before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply wanted to find out, because I am much interested in the immigration bill, and would like to be here to vote if a vote is to be had. As the debate seems to be wandering from that bill, I wanted to be acquainted with the fact.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will incorporate the Senator's speech in mine, for economy of time.

The question is a question of consistency. The President in accepting the Democratic nomination, accepted the platform as a whole—those matters that were material and vital and the little immaterial matters. On the 31st of July Mr. Hughes, in accepting the nomination of the Republican Party and in accepting the Republican platform, accepted the declarations of the party with regard to woman suffrage in specific terms. He said:

I indorse the plank on suffrage in the platform.

It was called to his attention. He had given it consideration. He adopted the language as his own, and that language says this:

The Republican Party recognizes the right of each State to settle this question for itself.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Did not the candidate for President on the Democratic ticket in 1912 accept the Democratic platform as his own platform?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I had just stated the answer to that question before the Senator rose, and I will answer it again. The President of the United States did accept the platform. The distinction that I am making now, however, which is apparent to the Senator from Idaho, is that Mr. Hughes on the 31st day of July specifically said, in his speech of acceptance—

I indorse—

Not the whole platform; he went further—

I indorse the plank on suffrage in the platform.

And, mind you, that plank said:

The Republican Party recognizes the right of each State to settle this question for itself.

That was a definite declaration of Mr. Hughes on the 31st of July. That declaration was absolutely inconsistent with any Federal legislation. It was absolutely inconsistent with the Susan B. Anthony amendment, because it would be impossible for each State to settle it for itself if three-fourths of the States could settle it for the other fourth or if any group of States could not settle it for themselves.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Has not the Senator from Nevada changed his mind on the Anthony amendment?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will explain that for the benefit of the Senator; but I shall be glad if the Senator will kindly not interrupt the course of my argument while I am trying to answer him by asking a new question. I will not forget the question that the Senator is asking me. I am now devoting myself to the inconsistencies, not of the Senator from Nevada, but of your presidential candidate, Mr. Hughes. I presume the former argument would be more pleasing to the Senator from Idaho and the Republican Party, and particularly to the Senator from Idaho, who differs with Mr. Hughes.

On the 31st day of July Mr. Hughes said, in his speech of acceptance:

I recognize the right of each State to settle this question for itself.

And, as I said, that is inconsistent with Federal action.

After an amendment to the Constitution is submitted by Congress and ratified by a vote of the legislatures or conventions of three-fourths of the States, it is binding on all the States, and therefore it is impossible to guarantee to each State the right of individual action under such procedure.

Now, mind you, that was in his speech of acceptance on the 31st day of July. On the next morning, not months afterwards, not after the general indorsement of the platform, but the next morning after that positive declaration, we find Mr. Hughes in a public telegram saying, "I favor the amendment," meaning the Susan B. Anthony amendment, "I think it should be passed and ratified as soon as possible." There is an inconsistency within 24 hours. There is no chance whatever for him to have forgotten the plank in the Republican platform. There is no excuse that conditions had arisen that would justify him in changing his mind. He changed his mind over night, if he changed it at all. That was the statement he made.

Now, then, on the floor of the Senate on August 5 I asked the Senator from Idaho—I do not know whether he was present or not; I doubt it; but I asked him by name—and I asked others if they placed any different construction on that plank in the Republican platform than I had placed on it; that is, that it was in direct opposition to any Federal amendment to the Constitution looking to the granting of suffrage. Of course, there was no answer to it, and there will not be. It is too plain a construction. The Senator naturally denies that Mr. Hughes is attempting to use it for politics. I am not charging him with using it for politics; I am not charging anything, but only stating certain facts. On August 5 I asked him what he would do if he were elected President of the United States. I asked him if he would use the power of his office as the President of the United States or use the influence of his office to pass the Federal amendment as the President used his influence to pass the child-labor bill. I asked him what aid he would lend to the suffrage movement in this country for the passage of that amendment.

That question has been asked him all over the country, and we have not heard him answer it yet. He is trying in the Western States to pose as favorable to the Susan B. Anthony amendment and at the same time he is in hopes his party in the East will be able to explain to those who are opposed to it that that is only a personal view; that if Mr. Hughes is elected he will not turn his hand over to influence the Members of Congress.

Just the other day the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] attacked the President of the United States and practically charged him with a violation of the Constitution of the United States because, forsooth, he came up to the Capitol, to his office that he has in this building, and possibly urged some of the Democratic leaders of this body to hasten the passage of the child-labor bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Nevada think the President ought to use the power of his office to influence legislation?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will answer that question. I desired to answer that same question the other day when the Senator was speaking and this matter came up, but I did not at that time wish to interrupt the course of his argument. At that time I called the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that Mr. Hughes was being supported by certain women in this country because they believed he was going to use his influence with the Members of his party in Congress to pass a suffrage amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which his party had declared against. I asked him then whether he favored such a threat, and he said no; he said he would not vote for any man who would use his influence or his power as President of the United States to attempt to interfere with this legislative body. Do I quote the Senator correctly on that?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Nevada has not quoted me with precision, but he has the general idea all right. The President of the United States or a candidate for President of the United States has a perfect right to his opinion, and he may give it just such publicity as he desires, but I deny that any President, no matter to what political party he may belong, has the right, moral or constitutional, to use the power which resides in the presidential office to influence Members of Congress.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then I will answer the Senator's question with regard to my opinion, and it is only an humble opinion compared with that of the distinguished Senator from Iowa. No officer of this Government has a right to interfere with the functions of another branch of the Government.

I do not think that that can be contradicted; I certainly shall not attempt to contradict it. But while the Constitution of the United States does not direct the President of the United States to address the Senate of the United States on any question whatever, and while the power granted to him to address both branches of Congress in joint session may not be construed as a power to address himself to one of these bodies, still in determining whether or not he is violating the Constitution, as was practically charged by the Senator the other day with regard to his use of influence on behalf of the child-labor bill, we must then consider whether or not the act with regard to this body constitutes an interference with its legislative functions. Now, let us see for one instant. While the President of the United States represents the executive function, in part he performs the duty also of the legislative function. No act passed by Congress becomes a law until he has given it his approval in accordance with law. But there is granted to him further the extraordinary right in connection with the legislative power of these two bodies to veto an act passed by Congress, and after it is vetoed imposing the additional burden on these two bodies of passing it by a two-thirds vote over his head.

In the nature of things is not the President of the United States—in fact, by the very Constitution of the United States—is he not required to take an interest in legislation? That is, one phase of it.

Now, let me see what the Senator charges constitutes interference by the President with this body in violation of the Constitution of the United States. The President, for instance, comes to his office provided for him in the Capitol. He meets the leaders of his party in that office. He meets with men who have helped to prepare the platform of his party. He meets with men who stood sponsor for him when he was nominated and who declared to the people of this country that he intended to enforce certain legislation, if possible; that at least he intended, as a part of his duties, to use what power he could lawfully to pass such legislation, and in carrying out those declarations he reminds these leaders of his own party, these distinguished Senators, of the platform pledge of his party to pass the child-labor bill. He urges upon them the great humanitarian question, calls to their attention that they are human beings, that there are little children being ground to pieces day by day for the purpose of profit. He convinces them that an emergency exists, and he begs them to deal with the question immediately. That is not such a transgression of Executive authority as to constitute interference with this body.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the distinction between the proper influence of an Executive upon the affairs of the country and the improper influence upon the legislative body coordinating with him, if you please, in the government of the country is perfectly easy to define. I assume that the platform of the party to which the Senator from Nevada has referred is binding upon him as well as upon the President. Indeed, it is of greater obligation upon his part because it is addressed primarily to the legislative branch of the Government.

I think that a President, as of course everybody knows, has a right to communicate with Congress upon every matter that touches the public welfare. He has a right to veto any act of legislation which Congress may pass. I differ from the Senator from Nevada, although the difference may not be material that his power to veto makes him a part of the legislative branch of the Government. I look upon it from a very different point of view. That, however, probably is not material. He has an interest in the policy of his party and the policy of the country and he has a perfect right to announce it.

He has no right, however, by virtue of his high position, one of infinite influence almost to subordinate the conviction of the Senator from Nevada to his own conviction simply because the Senator from Nevada desires to be in harmony with the Chief Executive. That is the influence which I deplore.

I am not going to enter into any further criticism upon the President, because I recognized the other day, and I state now that it is a tendency which has unhappily been in existence, and it seems to be growing, for a great many years. I think that no Senator and no Member of the House ought to feel that if he does not yield to a view which he knows the President holds he will be therefore any the less welcome in the White House or that his association with the President will be any the less intimate and close.

I know, and the Senator from Nevada knows just as well as I, or better, how difficult it is for a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives to differ from the President when the latter really desires to exercise the power he has. It is a most disagreeable task or duty for a Member of Congress to disregard the earnest desire of the President, especially as the President distributes, I was about to say, millions of offices during the time of his incumbency, and inasmuch as the President is looked upon, and properly so, as the leader of an administration. It is for these reasons that I think the President ought to be exceedingly careful about the kind and character of influence which he seeks to impose upon the legislative branch of the Government.

I am perfectly sincere when I say if I believed that Mr. Hughes would use the power of his office—I emphasize the words of his office—to compel the Congress to enact such laws as he thinks ought to be enacted or to compel its action in any respect, I would not vote for him.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator answered my question. I forgot what it was that I asked, but he has answered it very fully, I am satisfied. Nevertheless the matter that he was discussing here on the 5th, when he made his complaint against the unconstitutional act of the President, was the child-labor bill. He was complaining because the President of the United States had taken such an interest on behalf of the people of this country as to come up to the presidential office in the Capitol and remind the members of his party of the emergency which existed with regard to that legislation.

Now, let me draw the distinction that possibly may exist between that influence by an Executive, an influence exerted with regard to the Susan B. Anthony amendment, or interference by an executive officer with Congress in the passage of any amendment to the Constitution.

The President under the Constitution is required to participate in the enactment of laws, as I have before stated, and whether it be construed as a function of legislation or not, the fact remains that the Constitution imposes upon him the duty of passing upon laws, the duty of participating in the passage of laws either by signing or by veto.

Now, with regard to the constitutional amendment, there is no such provision, there is no such intention. Had the President of the United States come to this body at the time the Susan B. Anthony amendment was under consideration and used his influence or the power of his office in the passing of that amendment or the defeating of that amendment, there might have been good ground for the argument that the Senator made against his influence in the child-labor matter, because he has no function to perform with regard to a constitutional amendment. A proposed amendment is passed by a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress, and then it goes directly to the several States of the Union. It does not go to the President of the United States like an act. It is not subject to his approval or to his veto. By the very terms of the Constitution itself, he is excluded from all authority over the matter. It is solely a question between Congress and the legislative bodies of the States and the people of the country.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator? I should like to ask the Senator if he sees any difference between the President of the United States coming here, conferring with a number of his friends, and the President of the United States remaining in the Executive office and calling his friends there? Ever since I have been in the Senate—and I think it has been done from time immemorial—the President for the time being has called his friends into consultation in the Executive rooms at the White House and consulted them about certain matters of legislation.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the question has answered itself. I want to conclude as briefly as possible. I did not precipitate this debate and had no intention of taking part in it. I believe that I have drawn a distinction between the use of the office of the Executive in influencing legislation and the influencing by the Executive of the passage of an amendment to the Constitution.

The President never attempted to influence a Member of this body, to my knowledge, with regard to such Member's action upon the Susan B. Anthony amendment. I never heard him give expression during the time the matter was pending and before the last vote as to whether he favored it or did not favor it. He left that matter entirely to this body. Yet to-day Mr. Hughes, the candidate of the Republican Party, the candidate of the party of which the distinguished Senator from Iowa is such a shining light, is threatening openly throughout this country to use his name, the power that his opinion may have, to coerce the Republican Party into voting for the Susan B. Anthony amendment, or his declarations are a fraud and a deception. That is the distinction I have tried to draw. I do not know whether it appeals to the Senator or not, but it appeals to me.

Now, let me pass on for a moment. The distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] attempted to confuse me in the beginning of my argument by asking me whether or not I have changed my mind with regard to the Susan B. Anthony amendment. He has a right to an answer, and he will have that answer.

Like the Senator from Idaho, I have believed in equal suffrage, and I believed in it long before the time I ever went into politics. I have believed in it on the broad principles of humanity and political economy. I have never been able to understand why one-half of the intelligent people of this country should be debarred the right to vote.

Back in 1910, when I was seeking the nomination, in every speech that I made I spoke for woman suffrage in my State and against the advice of my political advisers. I want to know if there was another Democrat or Republican in the State at that time who did it? The movement had just started. The resolution to amend the Constitution was submitted to the Nevada Legislature in 1910 and was passed. In 1912 I again supported it in every speech that I made from the stump. I want to know if there were any other candidates on the Republican or the Democratic ticket who so supported it?

I introduced it into the platform of my party in 1912. I have doubted and I do now doubt the efficacy of this constitutional amendment at the present time. I would rather delay the matter than to rashly fly in and meet defeat. That is poor strategy.

The speech the distinguished Senator from Idaho made was one of the strongest I have ever heard on this subject from his viewpoint. I know that he favors equal suffrage. I can not conceive how those women who so ardently support this amendment can expect that it will be consummated into an amendment of the Constitution of the United States until more States are converted to suffrage. There are only 12 suffrage States. The question has been fought out in a number of Northern and Eastern States in recent years and decided adversely to suffrage. I particularly refer to Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Ohio and those great States that have so tremendous a vote. I believe that these States can be carried by another election. Other great States will follow.

If we should pass this amendment to-morrow and submit it to the States, there are only 12 States out of the 48 in which there would be any hope in my opinion at the present time of ratifying it. Why would Pennsylvania ratify when Pennsylvania has voted in the very last year against it? Why would Ohio ratify it? Why would New Jersey ratify it? They have defeated it when submitted so recently. What hope is there of the amendment being passed at this time by such method? And yet if it is submitted to the States, it will require a vote by three-fourths of all the States to ratify it. The hopelessness of it at this time is too apparent.

Let me say what the result of the suffrage amendment will be if that is accomplished. It goes to the States and fails to get the necessary three-fourths and it is killed. When they go into an individual State for the purpose of urging it upon the voters of such State the people will say, "We decided that question the other day; we decided against you, and it is over forever."

You can not expect to vote to give woman the right to vote unless woman desires it and will use it when she gets it. I am firmly convinced that whenever the women of a State are educated to the purposes and privileges of the vote they will not only demand it but receive it. It is to be regretted that any women should have made any single question the sole issue when their votes are required to sustain the great humanitarian laws of Woodrow Wilson. He has suited such women in all that is great and good. They praise him because he has kept us out of war, protected the children, protected labor, stimulated commerce and industry, and yet they are willing to kill him because he differs as to the method of getting suffrage in some other State.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me suggest to the Senator that if a certain amendment is submitted it can be outstanding for 20 or 30 years; if it finally secures a vote of three-fourths of the States it will become operative.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is true, and it is the hope I may say of those who favor the national amendment that it may hang in the air for a certain length of time until it is passed, and I hope that they are right; but, on the other hand, that which I fear is that it will be submitted to a vote of the States and killed, and that that defeat will be used hereafter for the purpose of preventing further consideration in the States themselves. My fears may not be well founded and I am willing to bow to the judgment of the majority.

Now, let me go on just a little further with regard to this. I conceive that it is unfortunate for the cause of universal suffrage in this country that at this time a certain faction should arrogate to themselves the entire fight, that they should arrogate to themselves the entire sincerity, intelligence, and knowledge with regard to this whole subject.

They forget that 20 years before they came into existence there was a suffrage movement in this country, supported by some of the greatest and brightest women known to history. They have taken hold of this fight in a bitter, partisan way, forgetful of their friends and the services they have rendered. They have taken hold of it in a way that not only threatens to defeat the national amendment, but it is going to militate for years and years to come against a suffrage amendment in any State in which it is introduced.

It is impossible not to expect the male voters in States where they now have no suffrage to be affected by the experience of the men of the States who granted woman suffrage. There is no question of that. The distinguished Senator from Idaho has not had that experience. He does not have an organized movement against him by these zealous women, because he saw fit to utilize his own judgment in this matter for what he believed the best interests of women of his State. But I notice to-day that in some of the Western States where the women have been granted the right to vote some of them are fighting most bitterly the very men who fought for and obtained for them their right of suffrage.

I want to know what the effect of that example will be in the adjoining States when they reach out and ask the men there to grant their sisters the right to vote? These are practical considerations for those who desire, as I do, universal suffrage.

Let me say in passing that the only reason why these particular women are not going to forever condemn this movement is because they constitute a very small minority, and because the women of those suffrage States, like the women of Idaho, as reported by the Senator from that State, are not going to be dominated by these people coming from Newport, as the Senator from Colorado said, who are going into their midst for the purpose of telling them who have been their friends and who will be their friends.

Now, just one other thing. I voted against the Susan B. Anthony amendment in 1914. I have stated my reasons. They could be stated much more fully and much more broadly than I have stated them. I want to say that at the time the Susan B. Anthony amendment was voted upon in this body, at the time I voted against it, the question was under submission to the people of my State on a referendum vote. Since that time the people in my State by an overwhelming referendum vote have decided in favor of equal suffrage.

I might have had a right to form my own opinion with regard to the wishes of the people of my State, but I would have no right to do it after the people of my State had decided the question by a referendum vote, and it will be my duty to try to represent them as the representative of our State or to surrender my office.

I have never doubted the principle—I have differed from some of my friends as to methods—I am as sincerely interested in obtaining suffrage for all the women in every State as any member of the Congressional Union. I have helped them even this year in their efforts to present their arguments to the Senate. They then seemed to appreciate my efforts, but now I must die with my President, so they say; but they do not speak for the women of Nevada.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, before referring to the particular matter I have in mind to discuss, I beg leave to say a few words about the controversy to which we have just been listening concerning woman suffrage—only a few words about that—for that is a subject, as now presented, in which I am not profoundly interested.

I recall with interest the fact that within the last three years—that is, since Mr. Wilson has been President—I have time and again heard what was intended to be caustic criticism from the other side of this Chamber against the President, on the ground that he was ignoring the platform adopted at Baltimore when he was first nominated. There were two things particularly in that platform to which our friends on the other side were never weary of adverting to as grounds of criticism of the President and of their Democratic colleagues in the Senate. One particularly was the plank in the platform declaring for the principle of one term only for the President; the other related to the clause in the platform concerning the exemption of coastwise vessels from tolls in passing through the Panama Canal. We have all heard the charges rung, with many variations, on these two subjects; their story is quite familiar.

The question has been asked, "Should President Wilson be again nominated by the Democrats, in the face of the Baltimore platform? Would not such a nomination be to ignore a solemn declaration of the party?" I have never flinched under those thrusts, although our friends on the other side seemed to enjoy making them, and evidently were deluded with the idea that they were profiting thereby.

Mr. President, I do not hesitate to assert that the Baltimore platform did not commit President Wilson to a promise, expressed or implied, not to be a candidate for reelection. The platform did favor, and to that extent did commit the Democratic Party to, the policy of one term for the Presidency, going on further to say that that policy should be written into the Constitution of the United States. Here is the exact language of that plank of the platform:

> We favor a single presidential term, and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible for reelection, and we pledge the candidate of this convention to this principle.

That is to say, it is declared that it should be the policy of this Nation to have but one term for the President—whether for four or six or some other number of years is not stated; but one term—and that that policy should be written into the fundamental law. That is what the party pledged itself to and all it pledged itself to by that declaration.

I wish further to say that President Wilson was not a candidate for renomination, and certainly not any more than Mr. Justice Hughes was a candidate. The President said he was not a candidate; Mr. Hughes said he was not a candidate; but neither of them ever declared that he would not accept a nomination if tendered by his party. The Democratic Party of the United States, without a word, without an act, on the part of the President that could be construed into a solicitation, voluntarily and unanimously named him as the candidate of that party. There is nothing in that declaration of the Baltimore platform that makes his acceptance of a nomination thus tendered in the least degree inconsistent.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri permit an inquiry?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. Admitting that the President, by reason of the fact that this nomination was forced on him, was not bound by this plank in the platform, how can the Democratic majority of this Congress escape responsibility for not bringing up and passing, or trying to pass, the constitutional amendment to which their party is pledged? Let us shift responsibility for the time being and for the sake of argument from the President to the Democratic Party; still the language is certainly emphatic enough and definite enough in the platform that the party shall be pledged to pass the constitutional amendment, but the constitutional amendment has not even been considered in the committee of either branch of Congress.

Mr. STONE. I think the criticism of the Senator from Pennsylvania is perhaps not without justification.

Mr. PENROSE. I am glad to see that once in my life I have got the Senator from Missouri to admit something, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. Under this platform declaration I think the Senate and House of Representatives, where constitutional amendments are originated for submission, should have presented the matter. I will admit that.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I have in my possession, though I have it not here, a letter which the President wrote to Mr. A. Mitchell Palmer, at the time the House Committee on the Judiciary was about to consider the matter, in which the President advised against it.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am frank to say that, whether the President advised against it or not, I would have voted against it. Notwithstanding it was in the platform, I think it was a foolish and ill-considered declaration, so far as that goes; but I do not know the President's opinion about it; I never conferred with him in regard to it. I merely wish to say—and I do not care to broaden the argument—that the President was not bound by the terms of this provision in the Democratic platform to refuse a renomination; and even if it had been made broader than it is, as broad as any man here for any purpose would like to make it, I undertake to say that the Democratic Party, as a whole, or the Republican Party, in like circumstances, as a whole, can, when it comes to speak upon a declaration in a platform and express the party opinion as to what a convention has said, go over a convention and speak the popular thought; and so, if the Democratic Party of the United States, who sent delegates to Baltimore to make a platform, did not approve of a declaration in that platform, certainly the great State constituencies who made the delegates can repudiate any particular declaration or change it when they have a chance to speak; and these constituencies did, with absolute unanimity, demand the renomination of the President. And that settles it.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, I understand, Mr. President, that the President repudiates this particular paragraph in the platform of the Democratic Party.

Mr. STONE. I did not say that, but the contrary.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, how is it that the President, when he came down here and violated all the proprieties by knocking at the door and seeking admission into the secret conclave known as the Democratic caucus, did not bring up this constitutional amendment among the other matters that he thought fraught with importance in carrying out party pledges?

Mr. STONE. The President, as I am told, for I did not see him on the occasion referred to—the President came to the Capitol to confer with Democratic Senators with respect to what is known as the child-labor bill. That was his mission to the Capitol on the occasion adverted to by the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. That was not the first offense.

Mr. STONE. That was the particular "offense" to which the Senator refers. I do not know to what others the Senator especially adverts.

Mr. President, without further pursuing this subject from this side, I wish hurriedly to put the other side of this question. I listened with interest to what my friend the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] had to say in his colloquy with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] a moment ago. I was reminded of a declaration in the Republican platform upon which former Justice Hughes is running, that woman suffrage is a question to be left to the States individually. That is what the Chicago platform says. The St. Louis platform, also, as has been pointed out to-day, contains a similar declaration. But Mr. Hughes has, for reasons of his own, gone across the line and declared that he is for the so-called Anthony amendment. I suppose that is what he means by what he says, although he has never said it quite so broadly or clearly. He states that he is in favor of taking a short cut to get to the end desired. He means he is for an amendment to the Federal Constitution conferring universal suffrage, if he means anything, and that is an absolute repudiation of the policy announced in the platform upon which he was nominated and which he specifically indorsed. Should he be elected President he gives assurance that whatever influence he has will be used to secure the adoption of the so-called Anthony amendment. Now, with whom is he going to use that influence? How is any amendment to the Federal Constitution submitted to the States? Ordinarily in one way, and that is through the Congress, through the action of the House and the Senate, and that is the way sought by the proponents of this scheme. Mr. Hughes must therefore use his influence to induce my friend from Iowa and the rest of you to repudiate your platform and vote to do something that your great convention at Chicago declared should not be done.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Perhaps he will not come over to the President's room if elected——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Just a moment—but I have a vague sort of an opinion that if he should send for the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], or the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], or the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], or the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and take him or them in that back room in the President's offices or in the Blue Room in the White House, or take them out on the south portico, where the fountains are playing and reflecting the starlight and the moonlight, and where the flowers are smelling sweet, all enlivened by a little champagne and some fine cigars, to sit down there and talk it over, the environment would be far more seductive and probably far more effective—certainly as effective—as it would be in that hot little room in this building known as the President's Room. The difference would be this: That President Hughes would send for you to come to him, and every one of you would go, while our President, being more democratic, comes over here to talk with his own people on their own ground.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Missouri describes this operation with such precision and such detail that I have no doubt he has seen it in performance.

Mr. STONE. I have in former times.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I take his word for it. No President has ever sent for me to confer around a fountain, with the flashing stars reflected in the liquid pools of the White House.

Mr. STONE. Oh, well, he has sent for others, then.

Mr. CUMMINS. He may have done so. I am not of sufficient importance——

Mr. STONE. Oh, no; not that.

Mr. CUMMINS. To be coerced. It takes a Senator, of course, of some prominence and influence to come within the sphere of coercive or seductive arguments of that sort. I suppose these prominent Senators radiate their influence among the lesser luminaries.

But I rose to ask the Senator from Missouri where has Mr. Hughes stated that he would use the power of the presidential office to induce Senators or Members of the other House to vote for the Anthony amendment or any other act of legislation? I have not read any such statement as that, and I do not believe that Mr. Hughes is so forgetful of the Constitution of his country and so lost to the proprieties of the presidential office as to do anything of that kind. I should be glad if the Senator would point out where he has even indicated anything of that sort.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have not come armed with the many expressions the distinguished candidate of the Senator has seen proper to make during his campaign. Still it will not be denied by the Senator that Mr. Hughes has declared his unqualified support of an amendment to the National Constitution for woman suffrage.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think so. I so read his telegram——

Mr. STONE. So did I.

Mr. CUMMINS. Sent the day after his speech of acceptance; that is, as I understand, he has declared it to be his opinion that there ought to be such an amendment adopted to the Constitution; but I do not know of anything more than that.

Mr. STONE. Now, what do these good women in the country who are rallying to his support and announcing their opposition to President Wilson expect of Mr. Hughes? Is he fooling these women? [Laughter.] Is he playing with them for political purposes or is he dealing honestly with them out in the open? These women know, as well as we, that the power and influence of the President of the United States is very great. I have been here in the two Houses of Congress for many years under a good many Presidents—from Cleveland's first administration down to now—and I know about these matters. What is the use of our evading and trying to fool ourselves or anybody else? The President of the United States is looked to to lead the way in carrying forward the constructive policies of his party. Do these women, who are flocking to the standard of Mr. Hughes because of what he has said, expect him to sit in the White House with his lips closed because of a delicate apprehension that if he said a word to the Senator from Iowa or the Senator from Pennsylvania it might be thought he was intruding upon forbidden ground? You know better than that; you know these women expect and that you expect and that he expects, if he is dealing squarely, fairly, and honestly with these people, to use his influence as the Chief Executive to promote the thing he favors. If that be not true, then he is a weakling and unfit to be the President of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, after this I hope we have heard the last of Wilson forgetting the declarations of the Baltimore platform. It is utterly out of the question, utterly inconsistent—although you gentlemen on that side may not be afflicted with any serious compunctions upon the subject of consistency—it is utterly beyond reason for you ever again during this session of the Senate or during this campaign to refer to the President's attitude or to what the President has done with respect to the platform adopted at Baltimore, when the man in behalf of whom you are going on the stump absolutely ignores the declaration of your own platform upon a great social and political question of vast importance to the country. If you can do that without blushing, then your faces are adamant, and you are incapable of blushing.

Mr. CUMMINS. Or brass.

Mr. STONE. Well, "brass" is better than adamant. I merely wanted to say this much on this subject, so that we may have an end, once and for all, of this "tommyrot" about the ignoring of platforms.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PENROSE. I thought the Senator had concluded.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. STONE. No; I have not. I want to say a word—and that is what I especially rose for, Mr. President—about the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], which I understand is the pending motion, to displace the unfinished business, namely, the revenue bill, and take up the immigration bill.

Mr. President, speaking for myself, I am ready at any moment to vote on the immigration bill. I do not see why any Senator should hesitate to vote on that bill when properly offered. I am assured that the President is utterly indifferent as to whether the bill is sent to him or not. Practically every Senator here has expressed his views on that bill or recorded his attitude by his vote, and the President has expressed his attitude by vetoing the bill when it was sent to him by the last Congress. Our individual positions on the merits of this bill and the President's position on it are all well known.

I have not changed my position. I am still opposed to it in its present form. I am willing again to vote against the passage of the bill in the form in which it is now before the Senate, which is the same form in which it has been presented in former Congresses. I can not be driven from that position.

Mr. President, I think there are Senators who are afraid of shadows. They are afraid they will get hurt at home if they vote against the bill. When Mr. Taft was President, and that bill—the same bill we now have—was here, I spoke against it. I explained why I was against it. In the main I approved of its provisions, but I was unwilling to vote for the bill with the so-called literacy test in it, and so I voted against it; and when Mr. Taft vetoed it and sent it back to us, I voted against passing it over his veto. When it was up before us in the last Congress again I opposed it; I spoke against it, and by my vote I registered my opposition to it; and when President Wilson vetoed it and sent it back, I voted against passing it over his veto. This action did not hurt me at home.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator's position is well known on this measure, and that of every other Senator. We could pass this bill in five minutes, if the Senator would permit it, and let every one reaffirm his position. What is the objection to passing the bill now?

Mr. STONE. I am not in favor of passing it.

Mr. PENROSE. Or, what is the objection to voting on it, rather?

Mr. STONE. I am not in favor of it.

Mr. PENROSE. Is the Senator trying to obstruct a vote on the measure at this time by a filibuster?

Mr. STONE. No.

Mr. PENROSE. Is the Senator afraid of "putting the President in a hole," as the saying is, if the bill should be sent to him before the election?

Mr. STONE. No; I am not. The President's position is understood.

Mr. PENROSE. What possible object can there be in not having a vote now?

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will possess his soul in patience, he will understand what I have in mind.

Mr. PENROSE. I will sit down and listen very attentively.

Mr. STONE. Well, sit down and listen attentively. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I am opposed to this motion of the Senator from South Carolina for one sufficient reason, without giving others—the Democratic conference or caucus, as has been already stated here, by a unanimous vote——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I wanted to correct the Senator from Indiana when he made that statement. My vote was recorded against it, and notice was given to the caucus—the Senator from Indiana made that statement——

Mr. TAGGART. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. That I was in favor of the bill and was pledged to my constituency to vote to take it up at this session.

Mr. PENROSE. Is there a record of the votes taken in the caucus?

Mr. STONE. I think there is a record.

Mr. PENROSE. Could that record be made available to the minority Senators?

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will sit down and be patient he will hear. I only ask him to keep his promise to me. I know he is nervous. Delicate, weakly sort of men usually are. [Laughter.] Their nerves tingle, and they can not sit down and remain quiet. Great big, strong, athletic men, like my friend here by my side [Mr. OVERMAN] and myself can be self-possessed.

Now, as I recall, there was a vote upon this subject, as stated by the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], as to whether the immigration bill should be put upon what we called the legislative program we were trying to make. We took a vote upon that, and the Senator from Georgia voted in favor of putting it upon the program.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I did not—oh, no, indeed. That is where the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. STONE. Did not the Senator vote in favor of putting it upon the program?

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, yes; my vote was cast in favor of taking up the immigration bill at this session, and notice was given in the caucus that under pledges made to my constituents, I would so vote.

Mr. STONE. Yes; I know what the Senator said. That is what I was trying to state.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator said the vote was unanimous, though, about making it a part of the program.

Mr. STONE. I have not gotten to that yet.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right.

Mr. STONE. I said that in the first instance, as I recall the record, the proposition was, when we were making up the program of the bills that we would press before the Senate, whether or not the immigration bill should be one of them. The Senator from Georgia favored that.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; that is right.

Mr. STONE. But the caucus did not favor that. On the contrary, it adopted a resolution that the chairman of the Democratic caucus should approach the chairman of the Republican caucus for an agreement to this effect—now I am going into what may be called caucus secrets, but they have been spoken of here, and I do not care much about it. They are not much secrets, anyway.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri be careful to say "Republican conference" instead of "Republican caucus"? We never hold caucuses.

Mr. STONE. I do not want to be interrupted with such inconsequential statements.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the Senator ought to be accurate.

Mr. STONE. I am accurate. The difference the Senator makes is, in fact, no difference at all. I use the terms "conference" and "caucus" indiscriminately. The chairman of our conference was directed to interview the Senator from New Hampshire, chairman of the Republican caucus, with a view to seeing if an agreement could not be made to take up the immigration bill the first thing at the next session of Congress in December, and make it the unfinished business, and keep it the unfinished business until it was disposed of. That resolution was agreed to at a vote in our conference. Then, later, it was proposed that if an agreement of that kind could not be made with the Republican side, that the conference pledged itself on its own account, as a party organization, to put the bill forward at the beginning of the session next December, and make it the unfinished business, and keep it as such until it was disposed of, whether our friends on the other side consented or not. As I recall, on that motion there were 38 votes cast for it, and not one against it. I think the record will show that.

Mr. HARDWICK. The record will show that, but the record will show further that I was not present, and the Senator who cast my vote cast it under a misapprehension of my position, and it was afterwards changed.

Mr. STONE. That I know nothing about. I am talking about what was done at the caucus.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator was present at the meeting that immediately followed that, he would have known that that change of my vote was made.

Mr. STONE. I know the Senator from Georgia expressed himself in favor of taking up the immigration bill at this session.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is it.

Mr. STONE. I have said that; but I am saying that the conference did not agree with him, and that in the final analysis the action taken by the unanimous vote of 38 members of the caucus or conference who were present——

Mr. HARDWICK. That is exactly the point on which I am at variance with the Senator. My vote ought not to have been recorded that way.

Mr. STONE. I do not know anything about that. I never heard of that before.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think the Senator from Missouri was present when I made the statement that in view of certain facts that had transpired prior to the caucus touching this measure I would not be bound, and for the purpose of keeping faith with the caucus I retired and was not present when the vote was taken.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, that is not an unusual performance, I am sorry to say.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. I have more than once seen gentlemen come into Democratic caucuses or conferences—whichever term you prefer—take part in them, make speeches, express views, vote for or against motions and resolutions, until they found that a majority—may be an overwhelming majority—of their colleagues were not in accord with them and then beg to be excused, take up their hats, and leave. That is not, I am sorry to say, an unusual performance. It happens too frequently for our party good.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I think the Senator wants to be fair.

Mr. STONE. I do. Have I made any misstatement?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Only twice have I taken action similar to this, including this in the two instances. I did not wait until the vote was taken. I did not participate in the debate any further than making my statement in the beginning of the caucus; and, as I recall, another subject was under discussion when I retired. I knew nothing about the resolution until the next morning, and was informed—as several of my colleagues will bear me out—that even the resolution was not binding; that it was simply an expression on the part of the caucus. I have tried with jealous care to avoid participation in a thing under such circumstances that, if I am whipped, I will not stand by it, and if I succeed I expect that others shall. Hence the action that I took; and I think my colleagues will exonerate me from any such imputation.

Mr. STONE. There is an old Latin adage—I think I can quote it—"De gustibus non est disputandum." There is no disputing about a matter of taste. Every Senator, every man, must regulate that sort of thing for himself. When I go into a gathering of Democrats, or any other kind of gathering with which I am affiliated, to discuss things, talk over things, and determine upon a plan of action—determine what we are going to do affirmatively and what we are going to do negatively, by which I mean what we shall put aside for the time being—I go in with the idea of standing by my colleagues, win or lose. It is the only way I know how to act.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make an inquiry on that point?

Mr. STONE. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania had better sit down and be patient.

Mr. PENROSE. I thought I could help the Senator, and enlighten or illuminate his position a little bit.

Mr. STONE. No; I do not think the Senator can. Moreover, I am not talking to Senators on that side, and they have no right to be "butting in."

Mr. PENROSE. This is an open caucus on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. I am talking to Democrats, to my party colleagues on this side. We held conferences, and we agreed upon a program, and although there may have been one or two or three Senators, even more—two have spoken here already—who did not intend to be bound by what was done and who left the conference; still it must be remembered the conference acted. As to leaving the conference, I wish to say, without meaning to be offensive, that I have never had occasion to leave a Democratic conference, although often my views have not been acceded to. I never go in with the idea that I must have my way or quit.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will excuse me, the caucus, so far as the printed notices were concerned, was called for another purpose. How could we tell what was going to be brought up until we got there?

Mr. STONE. What was the purpose?

Mr. HARDWICK. The purpose was to consider the child-labor bill, as written on the notice, not immigration.

Mr. STONE. I can not join issue with the Senator about that, because I do not recall the facts as to that.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think I am right. Of course, I am willing to have the Senator correct me; but I think I am right.

Mr. STONE. I only know this—that we were there, as I understood, to discuss what we were going to do.

Mr. HARDWICK. The caucus notices did not state that.

Mr. STONE. I can not speak of the notice, because I do not recall it. That might be looked up, if it is of value. I do not think it is of any value.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, here is the situation, and I am putting it to my friend from South Carolina—and I esteem him as a friend. We may differ; we may have sharp clashes, such as we are having now; but I would not have that affect my personal relations with him. Here is what I wish to say to you Democrats: We did agree—there is no doubt about that—to put forward the revenue bill. When the shipping bill, the child-labor bill, and possibly the workmen's compensation bill, were disposed of the revenue bill was to be taken up and made the unfinished business. That we did agree to. I am not mistaken about that. That was agreed to, I was about to say, with absolute unanimity, certainly with practical unanimity; and that agreement was ratified here on Saturday, on the floor of the Senate, when we agreed to make it the unfinished business.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will yield to me again, it was done by my colleague, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], after the Senator from North Carolina had stated to me—I know there was no intent to mislead—that they did not propose to bring up the matter at all until Monday. If the effort had been made in my presence, and I had not gone off after that statement, I should have objected to the consideration of the revenue bill.

Mr. STONE. It has not been brought up until Monday.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, yes; it was done on Saturday, late Saturday afternoon, after the most of us had gone.

Mr. STONE. Oh! I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. This is Monday.

Mr. STONE. I know it is Monday.

Mr. HARDWICK. This was done on Saturday.

Mr. STONE. What I mean is that the consideration of the bill has not been brought up until Monday—that is to-day.

Mr. HARDWICK. But the action was taken on last Saturday, after most of us had gone home. I was not here. I would have objected to it right then if I had been here.

Mr. STONE. I know nothing about that. But in that event it would have gone to a vote.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, of course; and you would have had to have a quorum here to vote on it then, of course.

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. But the Senator must not charge us with laches in respect to that, because we had no idea that such action as that was contemplated

Mr. STONE. I am not charging laches, Mr. President—nothing of the kind. I do mean to charge, if that is the proper word—I do mean to assert—that it was agreed in the Democratic conference that the revenue bill was to come on as the unfinished business at this time.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; but the Senator—well, I do not want to keep bothering the Senator.

Mr. STONE. The Senator does not bother me.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will state to the Senator, then—we may just as well have this historically accurate—that there were certain Senators there who had given notice, in accordance with the rule, that on account of pledges they had made to their constituencies, so far as the immigration bill was concerned, it was excepted from any of these agreements and understandings. Now, that is the fact.

Mr. STONE. Oh, well, I will not dispute about that. It might be that some Senator, may be two or three Senators, in the Democratic conference said, "You can not bind me to this or that." Well, I am not trying to bind you. I do not want to bind you. I could not bind you if I wished.

Mr. OVERMAN. The caucus did not attempt to bind anybody.

Mr. STONE. The caucus is powerless to bind anybody. The obligation of a Democratic Senator to his party is a matter which addresses itself to his own judgment and sense of party loyalty and allegiance. Every man must judge that for himself. When the overwhelming voice of his associates determine upon a certain policy, it seems to me remarkable that two or three or four men are so much greater than their party, so much wiser than all their fellows—or think they are—that they can cast the party view aside, throw the aggregated party conclusions to the wind, and say, "We will take our own course."

To be sure, Senators can do that; but what then becomes of party allegiance or party solidarity? How, then, will we accomplish results on this side? If we split apart in that way at the dictation of one or two or a half dozen Senators, who rise in opposition to the overwhelming judgment of their colleagues, how can we make headway?

Let us see just what has happened here to-day. A motion has been made by the Senator from South Carolina, in utter contempt of the judgment and action of the Democratic conference.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Wait a moment, now.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But the Senator says this was done in utter contempt of the action of the conference.

Mr. STONE. Well?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It was exactly along the line of my statement on the floor of the Senate before ever you held a conference that this Senate should have an opportunity to vote on the immigration bill. I stated, before ever you took action in the caucus, that I would keep that pledge. I have kept it. I would be in contempt of myself if I pursued any other course.

Mr. STONE. The Senator has kept his pledge. He has. He made his motion. Now, what happened? In effect he has turned the control of legislation in this body over to the Republican side of this Chamber. What was the vote? I looked at it. Twenty-four Democrats voted against the motion of the Senator from South Carolina and only 5 voted with him, he making one of the 5, and 22 Republicans voted with him—a total of 27; and they carried the Senator's motion over the Democratic side by a majority of three.

That may be a record of which the Senator is proud. He may be glad to take it down and display it on the outer walls before the sturdy Democracy of South Carolina. Maybe so. Maybe my friend from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] will find joy in exploiting this achievement before the equally sturdy Democracy of the great State he represents. These Senators have a right to enjoy these triumphs if they feel that way. For myself I do not feel that way. I would rather cast my fortunes, I would rather find myself allied, with the 24 Democrats who voted to go on with the Democratic program as agreed upon and take up this great revenue bill, than to have been one of less than half a dozen who walked across this aisle and clasped hands in fellowship and cooperation with the Republicans, thereby practically turning over the control of the Senate to that party.

Mr. President, that is the way I feel about it, and that is all I have to say about it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if I were able to submit in silence to the strictures of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], I should have very little respect for myself. He is neither the judge, nor can he possibly constitute himself the censor, of my conduct on this floor.

The Senator's strictures on the nine Democratic Senators who supported the motion of the Senator from South Carolina are worth but little, unless, perchance, they should happen to come to the ears of some one who does not know my good friend from Missouri and does not understand the Senator and his uncontrolled and unlimited capacity for lecturing both his Republican and his Democratic associates in this Chamber. Of course, with those who have been here and have heard the lion roar before, it is more of a joke than anything else. There is nothing either serious or terrifying about it—nothing; and for one I refuse to be either terrified or dismayed by it. I represent just about as many people as he does, and just about as good people, and just about as good Democrats. To them, and to them alone, will I give an account of my stewardship in this body. I suspect that if our records could be examined, year after year and election after election, it would be found that in my humble way I have been just about as loyal to the Democratic Party, to which we both belong, and have contributed just about as much to its success, in proportion to my small ability when compared with his, as has the distinguished Senator from Missouri.

But I am not here, Mr. President, to bandy words with the distinguished Senator over this matter. The vote I cast this morning is one for which I will neither here nor hereafter ever make an apology. It is one I am proud to have cast. Why? Because I promised my constituents in the campaign that resulted in my election to the United States Senate that I would do all in my power to secure the earliest possible passage of the immigration bill. I said to them: "I have helped to pass it once in the House of Representatives, where I reported from the Committee on Rules a special rule for its consideration. I helped try to pass it over one President's veto there; and if you will send me to the Senate of the United States, I will do all in my power to secure its early consideration and its speedy and certain passage by that body."

Senators, I tell you now that if we should establish in our conference room, or in our caucus room, the intolerant spirit that has been manifested and expressed here on this floor by the distinguished Senator from Missouri more than once, we would not have much of a Democratic Party left in 30 days. One of the rules of our caucus, and almost its first rule, is that no caucus action can bind a Senator to violate previous pledges that he has made to his constituency. Upon that basis, sound and stable—the necessary basis of honor in all public and private transactions—I rest, first of all, my conduct in this matter. So, I apprehend, will my friend from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and other Democratic Senators who voted with us in this matter and who are just as good Democrats as the Senator from Missouri ever dared to be.

Mr. President, we were to meet in caucus to consider one subject, and when we got there it developed afterwards—I did not know until the next morning—we had also considered another, an entirely disconnected subject, to wit, the immigration bill, and that action had been taken by, I reckon, a dozen or more of our colleagues who were present and had proxies from those who were absent, because I know the distinguished Senator who had my proxy voted me on that question wrong.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia rose.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, I know in my case. It was altogether unintentional.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator left his proxy with me without any suggestion as to how to vote. I, of course, understood that I was to vote my own view, and I did so. When subsequently the Senator told me that I misunderstood his attitude on the subject and that he desired to vote the other way, I called attention to it and had it corrected.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am not charging my colleague with anything wrong.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I took it for granted that without instructions the Senator meant me to vote as I thought he ought to vote.

Mr. HARDWICK. The reason I did not make any specific request of the Senator was because I had made a speech that very day on the floor in which I had said I would do everything I could in honor to get a vote on the immigration bill this session. Of course, the Senator overlooked that when he cast my vote to the contrary, but I am glad to say, with the kindness and friendship and courtesy my colleague has always exhibited, he corrected the record so far as the vote cast by him for me was concerned. I appreciated his friendship and courtesy in that matter, and am far from intending to find fault with him about it.

I lay it down as a principle that the American people will never on earth submit, and they ought never on earth to submit, to the proposition that men can go into a party caucus behind closed doors and commit each other to a course of action upon matters that are not in any way embraced within the scope of the party creed. Political parties, Mr. President, are associations of individuals who meet together on common ground because they believe in common in certain principles. They ought to have, and they do have, whenever they are efficiently managed and whenever they produce good results in this Republic, party action with respect to the matters embraced in the party creed, covered by the party principles. So far so good.

Any action of that kind is within the scope of the agency. It is within the power of these men who exercise authority delegated to them by the great constituencies that they represent. But I utterly deny, and I utterly dissent from the proposition, that any number of Democratic Senators on this side or any number of Republican Senators on the other side can carry their colleagues up into some room and bind them and tie their hands and chain their consciences and still their voices and their votes about something that is not embraced in any party platform or in any way covered by the party creed. I have said once before on this floor, and I am glad to have this opportunity to say it again, that men who would undertake to do that and men who do undertake to do it display so little of real leadership that they are liable to wreck any political party that trusts them with leadership. It can never be safely done. It is undemocratic and un-American.

For one I tell you, neither now nor later or ever can you bind Democrats to something that the Democratic Party has no platform on, has declared no faith on, when a Senator's constituents demand an opposite course, when the Senator's pledge is to the opposite course, and when his own judgment and conscience impel an opposite course. If the distinguished Senator from Missouri thinks that is treason, let him make the most of it. I defy him or the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] to take me into a Democratic caucus and bind me to a course that the Democratic Party has not declared upon and that is contrary to the wishes of my constituents and to my own judgment and conscience.

I represent 3,000,000 people on this floor. I know, and my colleague knows, that fully 90 per cent of them believe with all their hearts and souls and minds that this bill ought to pass, and that just as soon as possible it ought to be enacted into law, long before the readjustment of conditions in Europe growing out of the war, which may make it more difficult to enact it then than now.

Am I to stand by with that situation before me, representing those people to whom I have promised that I would do all in my power to have this legislation enacted into law at the earliest possible moment, and because, forsooth, the Senator from Indiana or the Senator from Missouri or the Senator from somewhere else thinks it is the best policy for them not to vote on this question and see this opportunity to do so pass? No! When they undertake to bind me to such a course I simply say to them, "Your action can have no effect on me. You have no authority to bind me or any other Democratic Senator to adopt such a course. It is not within the scope of your authority, and it is not the proper subject matter for any party caucus, because the party has no creed upon this question."

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that there was no binding resolution introduced.

Mr. HARDWICK. I was coming to that. I am proceeding on the theory that the Senator from Missouri stated the situation with a moderate degree of accuracy, but as my friend from North Carolina points out by his interruption there may have been no attempt to have a binding caucus agreement about it—I do not know, because I went off and I was not there and did not know that the immigration question was coming up at all. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] now suggests that there was no attempt to bind anybody about this matter.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I would suggest to him that the thing that gives binding effect to caucus action was the concurrence of the steering committee in that action and the decree of that imperial body that you should do it. That was the thing that gave force and effect to the caucus action. That was the law that you and I and a few other Senators who were bold enough to violate or to question the inerrancy of that little coterie and dare to represent our constituents in this Chamber as our judgment and consciences dictated to us. That is the crime that you have committed which has brought upon your devoted head the withering sarcasm of the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. HARDWICK. I thank the Senator from Mississippi for his interruption.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield for a question.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is not for a question. It is to correct what I consider a very unjustifiable attack upon the steering committee.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have been on the steering committee for a great many years, and I desire to say that the steering committee never has undertaken to bind anybody whatever. Whatever it has done has been in the shape of suggestion only. We never have claimed to do more than to make advisory suggestions as to the order of business.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What I said was inspired or suggested by what the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] said a few moments ago in the discussion of this question when he said the steering committee had outlined this program.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from Indiana who sits next to me says that the Senator does not advert to the fact that he coupled the steering committee and the Democratic caucus.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not know about that, but I do know that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] was criticizing Senators for doing what I think they had not only the right to do but it was their duty to do.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I can only say that the steering committee is a creature of the Democrats of the Senate and it is undertaking to exercise no functions that were not given to it. The only functions that were given to it and the only functions they have endeavored to exercise have been advisory.

We have advised and suggested an order of business in the interests of the dispatch of business for which Congress is in session without undertaking to bind a single Senator to pursue that course. They never undertook to dictate to them; they never undertook to exercise any restraint, any compulsion, or pressure of any sort. I defy any Senator to say that I ever endeavored to exert any pressure. I have stated the propositions to them and have given the reasons why we thought a given order of business was advantageous, and left it to the judgment of each Senator to accept those suggestions or to reject them.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am glad to have that statement made by the Senator from Virginia. It clears up the atmosphere a little. It seems, from what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] suggests, that the conference did not attempt to bind us, and now it seems, from what my friend from Virginia says, that the steering committee did not try to bind us.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator will yield to me, I will ask him a question. I have talked with him scores of times, and I will ask him to state whether, as a member of the steering committee, I have ever made anything more than an advisory suggestion to him?

Mr. HARDWICK. As far as my personal knowledge goes, the Senator is entirely right.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. No other Senator can dissent from it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, we are making some progress, and now I want to say to our friends on the other side, Do not get too joyful over this Democratic family row. It is very hard for independent-minded Democrats to work together with machine smoothness at all times. We have these little tilts. It is not anything very serious, and as far as this diversity of views expressed in the Chamber is concerned I think it proves one thing—a party caucus can only undertake and ought only to undertake to have anything like binding caucus action on matters which are strictly and legitimately within the party creed. When they go beyond that they have exceeded their power. When they go beyond, it is utterly useless for them to attempt to exert any such power, because no Senator with an atom of self-respect, or with an ounce of regard for the constituency he represents on this floor, will yield his judgment in any such matter.

When it comes to matters within the common ground on which the party has met, the case is quite different, and concurrence in judgment and harmony in action is easily secured.

Mr. President, so much I have said to justify the conduct of myself and other Senators who have voted for the motion made by the Senator from South Carolina once already, and so far as I am concerned, who are willing to continue to vote for that motion whenever it is made and as often as it is made. I know the people of the State in which I live—a vast majority of them—regard the immigration bill as more important than any other legislation that is pending before this body. If I am to be faithful to them, to their interests, to their wishes, and to their views, and to my own pledges to them on this subject, I must act according to my conception of the situation and do all in my power to bring this bill to a speedy vote. I do not see how in doing so I impinge on the rights of any other Senator from any other State—Democrat or Republican—and I do not see how or why it ought to hurt the feelings of anybody else who takes a different view of the situation. But as far as I am concerned, Mr. President, there is no need for anyone to try to chain me on this question, because it simply can not be done; that is all.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri took occasion a moment ago to say that as I offered the motion and nine Senators who voted to sustain it on the Democratic side had turned over to the Republicans the control of legislation. I am not going to stand here and attempt to defend my Democracy. As I said this morning, this is a bill, and I do not think the history of it will show there is any partisanship in it.

But be that as it may, I consulted with no one on the other side as to the action that I took. I simply promised my constituencies in the State from which I come that the bill they are so interested in should at my hands, whenever opportunity offered, have my support.

When I submitted the motion this morning to proceed to the consideration of the immigration bill I did it because on the floor of the Senate I said that I intended to do it; in the caucus I said that I intended to do it; to my constituency I said that I intended to do it; and I did it, carrying out what I thought was my duty and what I know at the bar of my conscience was my duty. It was not done with any respect to those who would back me up in the proposition to take up the immigration bill, but in the discharge of my duty as an individual Senator sustaining a pledge to his people.

If it so happened that the Republicans solidly voted for it, they had a reason. I am not questioning it. I, too, had a reason, and have a good reason why I submitted the motion.

I think if the record of the Democracy of the Senator from South Carolina since he has been a Member of this body were compared with the record of the Senator from Missouri, not in matters touching questions that do not enter into the platform but in questions touching the very fundamental difference between the two parties, it would be found that the Senator from South Carolina has been as loyal, or more so, to his party and his party's creed as the Senator from Missouri.

But I am not here to question the Democracy of one as against the other; I am here to repudiate the insinuation on the part of the Senator from Missouri that I have entered into collusion with the opposition party to bring about embarrassment to those who do not want immigration legislation at all.

The Senator says he is opposed to the bill; that he is going to vote against the bill. His record is against the bill. Therefore, according to him, any man who is in favor of the bill is against the Democratic Party, the logic of which is that he is the Democratic Party. I am willing to follow the Democracy as expressed by some, but I refuse to take the stamp of the Senator from Missouri when it comes to questions of this kind.

Now, Mr. President, I am not responsible for the action taken. The Senator from North Carolina has said—and he is not the only one, because the proponents of the measure to postpone this bill until next December, in informing me of it the next morning in the cloakroom, said it was an agreement that was not binding; that it was persuasive.

The people of America have sense enough to know that here is legislation that they want, and they want it now. Are you going to jeopardize anybody? What does that spell? That spells that you want to carry the election by a subterfuge and then after the election do as you please.

Now, as to the implied threat that I, by virtue of this motion this morning, had turned legislation over to the opposition, I shall very heartily support such parts of the revenue measure as appeal to me. Certain features that do not I propose to oppose. I am going to reserve to myself the right of an individual, legislating for 100,000,000 people in general and for a little over a million in particular, to use the best judgment that I have for their benefit.

I do not think those who find themselves in like position with myself in voting for a bill that was overwhelmingly passed by the House time and time again and overwhelmingly passed by this body will appreciate the statement that a man fails to be a loyal Democrat because he wants to have passed now a measure which, it is said, all will want to have passed 60 days from to-day. It appears, in view of these circumstances, that the interim of 60 days spells the difference between being a Democrat and a partisan of the Republicans.

Now, Mr. President, I want to read the names of those who voted for my motion, in order that they may go in the RECORD. I presume, in the estimation of the Senator from Missouri, it would take 10 Senators who voted in favor of the motion to equal 5 Senators who voted against it, and hence he said only 5 voted for it. The names of the Democratic Senators who voted for the motion are ASHURST, BECKHAM, CHAMBERLAIN, CULBERSON, HARDWICK, LANE, MYERS, OVERMAN, SMITH of South Carolina, and VARDAMAN—10 in all. I do not know that anybody has ever seen any particular evidence of their wishing or attempting to wreck the Democratic Party. The truth of the matter is, in a nutshell, that here is a bill, passed overwhelmingly by the House and sent to the Senate, referred to the Committee on Immigration, and there reported back unanimously by those members of the committee who were present for action by the Senate. It is now pending in this body. The American people are thoroughly familiar with it; the record of both parties has been made on it; and yet we who have supported the motion to take the bill up are charged with some kind of crime because at this session, when there is time to consider and pass it, we have endeavored to have that done.

I think even those who are opposed to immigration legislation, in view of certain complications that recently arose during the consideration of measures for the preservation of America and Americanism, as some call it, should be converted to this bill. I think the time has come when we should shut the door against any further foreign importation until we can Americanize and digest the hordes of aliens now within our borders, so that Senators may stand on this floor from any State in the Union and fight for the American flag without fear of going back home and having the title to their seats questioned by half-baked foreigners who have been given the right on American soil of exercising the ballot, while in their hearts their allegiance naturally belongs to another flag.

I would go further than this bill goes; I would shut the door until the present generation of aliens, including infants recently born, shall attain the age of their majority, rather than to permit unchecked the influx of foreigners, when we have already so many that the seats of men in Congress are jeopardized because of the opportunity afforded those who really are not familar with American institutions to express their opinions by the ballot as to the genius and needs of the American system of government, and who have injected into the debate here the question as to whether or not, if immigration legislation is enacted, they will be defeated or will not be defeated because of the foreign vote in their respective States. That very thing itself ought to appeal to every true American. If it be true that seats are to be jeopardized by those who are not in sympathy with the American spirit and the genius of our Government, it is but an additional reason why we should shut the door until such time, as by association and affiliation with the American people our alien population may be won over to a true appreciation of the American system of government and become real American citizens.

I think now the time is at hand when Republicans and Democrats, forgetting the differences that may divide the parties touching our commercial and economic systems, on a question affecting the purity of American citizenship and the maintenance of those things that are dear to our republican system of government, remembering the menace that displayed itself on the floor of the Senate during the days which have recently passed, for America's sake we should so legislate that we may assimilate and digest the alien population we now have rather than dilute our population with a further influx of the foreign element to add to the danger that menaces and threatens us at this time.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a petition praying for the striking out the Hindus clause in the immigration bill. The petition is signed by a large number of petitioners. It will be printed in the RECORD with the name of the first signer and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

The petition is as follows:

To the Senators and Representatives of the Sixty-fourth Congress of the United States:

The undersigned petitioners, citizens of the United States, respectfully show:

First. That there is now pending before the United States Senate an act passed by the House of Representatives, known as H. R. 10384, and entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States."

Second. That said proposed act unduly discriminates against an entire race of a great and worthy people, of the same Aryan stock to which the great majority of our fellow citizens belong and the inheritors of a civilization which has conferred benefits upon the whole human race—the Hindus.

Third. That the retention in said proposed act of the provisions which would exclude any of the Hindus who have formerly come to this country to reside, or who are likely to do so in the near future, merely because they are Hindus, would be a lasting stain and disgrace to the honor and humanity of our country, which has hitherto stood for equal opportunity for all and an open door for the oppressed of all nations.

Fourth. That at the present time, owing to the wise and humane laws of this country respecting immigration which have hitherto prevailed, a considerable number of Hindus of the student, scholar, and professional classes have availed themselves of the educational and other opportunities which our country offers them and are now residents here; that said proposed act places upon these classes humiliating and quite unnecessary hardships, such as the procuring and giving bonds, deportation at any time within five years, making that provision retroactive, and, in case of deportation, exposing them to possible prosecution in their own country for political opinions expressed by them during their residence here.

Your petitioners therefore respectfully pray that all said invidious and harmful provisions be stricken from said proposed act.

HARRIET SCHWARTZ.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, when the Senate went into executive session on yesterday I was about to say a few words to disclaim any intentional discourtesy to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] in declining to yield to him during the course of my remarks a little while before, and I shall now speak briefly on that point.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator let me interrupt him now for just a moment? Upon the Senator's personal statement to me I immediately struck from the RECORD the reference to that incident I had made. I was very sorry that I made it, but I asked the Senator twice to yield, and the RECORD shows the Senator said, "No; I will not yield."

Mr. KERN. It is the first time since I have been a Member of this body that I have had any occasion to enter such a disclaimer, for I flatter myself that every Senator here, Democrat and Republican, will bear testimony that my conduct here as Senator and as caucus chairman has been marked by uniform courtesy to all. If such testimony should be wanting, I would be deeply humiliated by the feeling that my constant effort to be courteous and mindful of the opinions and feelings of my fellow Senators had been in vain.

I have been frequently embarrassed during the past year because of imperfect hearing, which has made it extremely difficult at times for me to understand questions which have been addressed to me from various parts of the Chamber while on my feet. Those who are not thus afflicted can scarcely understand how disconcerting such an embarrassment may be. And it is for this reason, and this reason only, that I am not inclined to encourage interruptions while speaking by yielding for questions which in many instances are difficult for me to understand.

It is particularly difficult for me to hear and understand Members who are behind me in the Chamber and whom I do not at the moment see. So on yesterday when some one behind me requested that I should yield for a question, I declined to yield, not knowing who had made the request. I was not sure that a second request was made, but hearing some remark in the rear, I again announced that I do not yield.

If I had known that the junior Senator from Georgia had made the request I would have gladly yielded, for it appears that just previous to his request I had stated that 38 Senators had voted in conference to make the action of that body binding party action, and if I had seen the Senator from Georgia on his feet at that time it would have occurred to me instantly that his vote in the conference, cast by his colleague, had afterwards been changed on the record at his request, and I would have been glad to have corrected the statement without a question. The thought in my mind was that every Democratic Senator present in the conference when the vote was taken had voted in favor of that action, and the mention of the number was quite superfluous, though in fairness it should have been stated that the junior Senator from Georgia and the senior Senator from South Carolina had left the room before the vote was taken, requesting that their votes be cast by other designated Senators, and that in both instances, through a misapprehension of their instructions, their votes were not cast in accordance with their wishes.

I have a very high regard for the junior Senator from Georgia and great admiration for his remarkable ability. There was no earthly reason why I should have departed from the practice and habit of a lifetime and treated him with intentional discourtesy, and I am sure he will believe me when I say that I had no thought of doing so.

Mr. President, I have no word of criticism, certainly no word of severe criticism, for the Democratic Senators who on yesterday, during the morning hour, voted to take up the immigration bill. By that action they were only voting that that bill should be considered until 2 o'clock, when the revenue bill, the unfinished business, would automatically come before the Senate. The junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], for whom I have, as he knows, the warmest personal regard, informed me of his intention to move to take up the bill during the morning hour, and I expressed not a word of objection. With nothing else pressing upon the attention of the Senate, several of the Senators, who I do not believe will vote to displace the revenue bill, voted as they did.

The question now before the Senate, Mr. President, is an entirely different question from that presented on yesterday. Yesterday the question was whether or not the immigration bill should be considered for an hour. There was no thought in the minds of many of those voting on either side that the bill which was already the unfinished business of the Senate should be displaced. But this morning the question before the Senate is not that of yesterday. The question is whether or not the business of the Senate as laid out shall be disarranged entirely, and whether or not the unfinished business of the Senate shall be laid aside and the hour of final adjournment indefinitely postponed.

I sincerely hope—and I do this without questioning the motive or action of any of the Senators who voted either way on yesterday—I sincerely hope the motion to supersede and set aside the unfinished business of the Senate will be disagreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will detain the Senate but a moment at this time on a matter more personal than otherwise. It appears by the RECORD, on page 12929, that in the course of his remarks on yesterday the distinguished Senator from Indiana made this statement:

> After that, by the unanimous vote of all present, the unanimous vote of 38 men, that action—

Speaking of the caucus action in reference to the immigration bill—> that action was declared to be binding party action, and that in face of the fact that five-sixths of the men who attended that conference were as warmly in favor of the immigration bill as the Senator from South Carolina or the Senator from Georgia or any other man.

You will observe, of course, the Senator from Indiana called my name especially in connection with that statement. I then interrupted and addressed the President of the Senate:

> The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Georgia?
> Mr. KERN. In a moment.

Then the Senator from Indiana went on with another statement. After he had finished his statement I interrupted again and said:

> Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——
> The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Georgia?
> Mr. KERN. I will not yield just at this time.

Mr. President, of course I felt a little hurt that the Senator from Indiana should make a statement, even unintentionally, misstating my position; and of course I understand that he would make no misstatement, except unintentionally, about the matter, and be unwilling to let me correct it at the very moment before any false impression about it was given to the Senate and to the country. Still I realized on yesterday, after I made the remarks I did expressing some resentment over the Senator's failure to yield, and after the Senator had told me personally that he had not heard me distinctly and did not know who was trying to interrupt him—that the Senator's infirmity, to which he has alluded and for which I have the greatest sympathy, was probably the cause of it; and I want to express my regret that I said anything at all about it or displayed any resentment over it.

There is no Senator in this body for whom I have a warmer regard than for the Senator from Indiana, and I will say for him that if the party management at all times were along the lines of conciliation and of considerate treatment that the Senator uniformly indulges in toward his fellow Senators on this side of the Chamber and on the other side the party management at times, I think, would be better.

I only say this much out of justice to the Senator from Indiana and myself. On yesterday I realized too late that the Senator's infirmity of hearing probably was the occasion of the entire incident.

I do not care at present to discuss the pending question before the Senate, because other Senators want to do so; but I rose to make this personal statement out of justice to myself as well as to the Senator from Indiana. I think it is well understood in this Chamber that I have the warmest regard for the Senator, and I regret the incident.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, it is painful to me, and I regret that the untimely remarks of my friend from Missouri [Mr. STONE] compel me to make a statement. I have no apology to make, but I do want to say to him that he knows—and I will ask him if it is not so—that the rule of the caucus is that no caucus action, even by a two-thirds vote, shall control the vote of any Senator about any matter that conflicts with his pledges made to his constituents or which conflicts with his honor or with his views of the Constitution. The Senator helped to make that rule; he was present when it was made, and I ask him whether or not that is not the rule of the caucus?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina is as familiar with the rule as I, and he has stated it correctly; that is to say, the rule that where two-thirds of the entire membership of the caucus—not two-thirds of a bare majority—adopt a certain measure as a party measure, it becomes such. There are exceptions to the rule: One is where a Senator can not support a measure because he regards it as contrary to the Constitution; another is that he can not support it or oppose it, as the case may be, because of pledges that he has made to his constituents. There are those two exceptions and some others which have been made to the rule.

Mr. OVERMAN. I remember very well when the rule was adopted. It was introduced by the late Senator from Tennessee, Mr. Carmack, and advocated by the Senator from Missouri. So that is the rule.

Mr. President, some eight years ago I made a speech favoring an immigration bill containing a literacy test. I learn some million copies of that speech have been printed and sent over the country, not by myself but by certain organizations. That was about eight years ago. Since that time I have introduced in every Congress immigration bills containing the literacy test. I have in season and out of season, on the stump and by letter, pledged myself to my people time and time again that I would support an immigration bill whenever it came up.

When the matter came up in the caucus I notified the caucus that I could not vote against the immigration bill if it came up in the Senate. I did that in a colloquy with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I am sorry he is not here, but if he were he would bear me out in my statement. I have stated even at this session that I had written letters to the effect that I would vote for the immigration bill whenever I had an opportunity to do so. When I voted yesterday to take up the immigration bill I was within my right as a Senator, both as representing the people of North Carolina and my right as a caucus Democrat, and within the rule of the caucus, which had been voted for and advocated by the Senator from Missouri himself.

Mr. President, the motion of the Senator from South Carolina to take up the immigration bill was made when there was nothing else before the Senate. As the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] states, it was made in the morning hour. I voted for it, as I had a right to vote, and I did not violate any party pledge or any party principle in doing so, but I was carrying out my pledges made to the people time and time again.

Mr. President, I am not going to play politics on this question. I have voted against a motion on the part of our friends on the other side of the Chamber to make this bill a rider to some other bill, and I propose when the motion comes up to vote against displacing the unfinished business; that is, the bill that is now before the Senate, which has been made by unanimous consent the unfinished business, to wit, the great revenue bill; but whenever the opportunity comes for me to vote to take up the immigration bill, I am going to do it.

The Senator from Missouri made some unfortunate remarks, which I did not take very seriously, and I do not think his colleagues here took them seriously. I think too much of him to assume any other attitude, for he could not reflect upon me, as I was acting within my rights as a caucus Democrat, as he now admits.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, on yesterday afternoon the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] appeared upon the floor of the Senate in his favorite rôle of censor of the Democratic side. Doubtless dreaming with open eyes of the victories of the days gone by, wherein he was wont to dispose of his disobedient senatorial brethren by "eating 'em alive in blocks of seven," he referred to the honorable Senators who had incurred his displeasure in this instance as "less than one-half dozen in number," while the RECORD revealed the fact that 10 Senators had failed to follow his lead, and therefore shared the rasping of his cruel verbal assault.

Mr. President, I should not have anything to say on this question this morning but for the fact that I was prohibited from doing so on yesterday, and the further fact that I know the purpose of the distinguished Senator from Missouri is to create the false impression upon the public mind that those of us who voted to consider the immigration bill were guilty of the crime of party infidelity. I think the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri used the strong word "treachery" in his reference to us. No self-respecting Senator will sit silent and submit to such opprobrium from the lips of one who insolently assumes at all times to speak with authority, as the senior Senator from Missouri is wont to do. And I might add that no Senator with a high sense of justice would utter such words as he has spoken of his colleague. Of course, the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri can not take from or add to my record or good name, or that of any other Senator, one iota by anything he may say, but his statement might be misunderstood if it were permitted to go unnoticed.

I have no objection to fair and honest criticism of my official conduct. On the contrary, I invite it. I have never done anything in my life in the performance of a public function that I desired to conceal from my constituents. The truth is I have always invited the utmost scrutiny; I have always been willing that the sunlight of publicity might shine in upon every thought and act of mine in the performance of my official duty. As I have said on former occasions upon the floor of this Chamber, I prefer that all the acts of the Senate should be performed in the open. I am opposed to secret executive sessions. They were born of a lack of confidence in the ability of the people to understand public questions and to direct the affairs of their own country. It is a relic that has come down to us from the dark days when the old lie was believed by everybody that kings ruled by divine right and the State was the master and the citizen the subject. I do not think any question that Congress is called upon to consider should be withheld from public scrutiny. I have infinite faith in the saving grace of the intelligence, honesty, and patriotism of the American white voter. I had rather trust to the "common sense of the most." I had rather take as my guide in the performance of my duty here the consentient judgment of all the people than to trust to the wisdom of any one man or coterie of men, even the Democratic caucus or the steering committee of the Senate.

If I may be permitted, without the appearance of egotism, I wish to say further that I have never cast a vote since I came to the United States Senate which even savored of infidelity to Democratic promises as announced in Democratic platforms.

I have universally taken as my guide the platform of my party, which, however, has not always had the approval of my judgment; for instance, the ship-purchase bill which passed this body a few days ago; but the national Democratic platform approved that measure, and, therefore, I yielded to that authority. I hope that my fears regarding the effect of that piece of legislation may not be realized, but still the doubt exists. I repeat, the platform is the supreme law governing my acts in matters of policy in this Chamber; and I have without variableness or shadow of turning kept faith with the platform. I may at times have differed from the President, and a majority of my Democratic colleagues in this Chamber—and I want to say that I never differ from them without regret—but whenever and wherever we have differed, according to my judgment, they have violated the platform and not I. But I have no criticism to make of their conduct.

Mr. President, I have never been so drunk on the wine of egotism, or any other sort of wine, that I felt that I was so wise, so good, or so just that I had a corner on all the wisdom, patriotism, and political virtue in this body. I am not the keeper of the consciences of my colleagues, and I trust that I may never become so vain and self-conceited as to think that when they go contrary to my judgment they are lost irretrievably and deserve political damnation without even the benefit of clergy.

In about the first Democratic caucus I attended, I think, after I came to the Senate I stated that I would not consent to the proposition advanced by some Senators that the caucus, even by a unanimous vote, was vested with the power to absolve me from the obligations I owed to the platform or to my constituents. I hold that the caucus has no more right or authority to abrogate a plank in the platform or release a Senator from the moral obligation to keep a promise to his constituents than Congress has to abolish a section of the Constitution without referring it to the people for their approval. It is a vain and false assumption that the creature should in any circumstance become greater than the creator. Thinking that way about it, I can not justify the feelings of indignation which the honorable Senator from Missouri, in the performance of his self-created office of censor, affects to feel toward those of us who have dared to vote for the consideration of the immigration bill. I need no suggestion or guidance by the caucus in the matter of carrying out the platform, and therefore I must decline to take orders either from the caucus or the steering committee, if their orders do not accord with my sense of public duty. I am always willing to confer with my Democratic colleagues and to discuss with them matters of public concern. Such conferences are always profitable to me; but when I go into a conference I do not think I am called upon to yield all independence of thought, to sacrifice my individuality, and to follow subserviently and blindly the will of the majority, however widely their conclusions may be at variance with my own convictions. Such a course as that would absolutely destroy all independence of thought and render progress impossible. It is positively preposterous and the time is not far distant when the people at the polls will express their utter disapproval of it.

I yield to no man in this Chamber in my devotion to Democratic principles and my fealty to the Democratic Party. I come from a section of this Republic where party organization is essential to good government. I believe in the patriotism of party organization; I realize that no beneficent principle of political economy, no great governmental scheme, was ever enacted into law that did not have behind it a well-organized and intelligently disciplined political faction; but that much-desired consummation never comes from servile submission to imperious, unreasonable dictation, and I have little respect for the judgment, the intellectual honesty, and dignity of character of a Senator who will do a thing just because a majority of his colleagues in a secret caucus—perhaps moved by extraneous influences—order him to do it.

I shall not criticize the record of the self-constituted censor, the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I am not interested in the record he has made, other than to hope it may bring him much happiness and peace of mind and promote his country's good. Those are matters that belong to him, and I am perfectly willing to concede him honesty of purpose and the loftiest of motives. Nor shall I animadvert upon the petulant criticism in which the distinguished senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] has indulged toward his recalcitrant colleagues. Assuring those distinguished Senators of my good wishes and "owning their weakness and evil behavior," I shall leave with "meakness their sins to their Savior"—and their constituents. If their records and services are satisfactory to the people who sent them here, they are entirely satisfactory to me. But that the record may be kept straight, I want to say that, if my recollection is correct, when the first Democratic caucus was called a short while ago to consider the question of a legislative program it was agreed in that caucus that the child-labor and immigration bills were both to be postponed until December. I favored both of those measures and rather preferred that both be enacted at this session, but a majority of my Democratic colleagues expressed a desire to close the session at an early date and I reluctantly consented to that program. I remember distinctly that the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] stated in the caucus that a failure to pass the child-labor bill would militate very much against the success of the Democratic Party in Indiana and probably defeat his reelection, which of course was a matter of great concern to me. But the caucus adjourned with a program agreed upon which left out the consideration at this session of the child-labor and immigration bills. The next morning I heard that the distinguished senior Senator from Indiana—the Democratic leader, mind you—was very much dissatisfied with the caucus action and was busily engaging himself trying to create sentiment in favor of rescinding the action of the caucus the evening before.

It was also whispered about that the President would be invited to take a hand in order to save the Senator from Indiana from the evil effects of nonaction upon the child-labor bill. The correctness of these rumors was soon verified. In due time the President of the United States appeared at the Capitol and called certain Senators into consultation; but as to what he said—or ordered—I am not at liberty to speak, since I was not one of the Senators consulted. And I wish to say right here that I have no criticism to make of President Wilson for his extraordinary conduct. It was unusual; but if he thought it the proper thing to do, that is his affair, not mine. I shall not deny to any man the rights which I arrogate to myself. The next morning, however, I was advised that another caucus would be called, and that in obedience to the behest of the President the child-labor bill would be added to the legislative program with the immigration bill eliminated. The caucus in due time materialized, and the things that I had heard as mere rumors became political facts. I attended the caucus, but did not remain very long, and stated freely and frankly to Senators with whom I consulted that I expected to vote for the child-labor bill and the immigration bill if brought before the Senate for consideration at this session.

I want to digress here just long enough to say that if the immigration bill is of the importance claimed for it, and if it has the unanimous indorsement which I have heard expressed by Democrats upon the floor of the Senate, it ought to be passed, and the time to pass it is at this session. The suggestion that it may be politically expedient to postpone action until after the November election I take no stock in whatever. It is a reflection upon the intelligence and the patriotism of the American people to imagine that anybody is going to be deceived by such a subterfuge. You can not and you should not obtain political office under false pretense. The Democratic Party will not approve such methods. You can not fool the people, and my observation is that the man who tries to fool the people usually winds up by making a fool of himself. The child-labor bill has passed and the immigration bill is before the Senate. I do not care whether it is considered now or after the revenue bill is disposed of; I do not care anything about that, and I think a Senator's vote on that question will not affect in any way his party standing. Certainly it should not do so. I shall vote for its consideration at this time, and if considered it will afford me infinite delight to vote for its passage; and in doing so I do not feel that I have violated my obligations either to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] or the titular leader, the amiable and much-respected senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

I want to say further that in doing so I do not feel that I will be guilty of any "treachery" to this Democratic administration or infidelity to the Democratic Party. On the contrary, this immigration bill is distinctly a Democratic measure, having received practically the unanimous support of the Democratic Members of Congress. That my conduct in the future may not be misunderstood, I feel that I should also state that so long as I remain a Member of this body I do not expect to be bound by any order that a Democratic caucus may adopt which is violative of the Democratic platform or contrary to my sense of obligations to my constituents; that I shall not permit anybody to prescribe my official conduct, especially if it should be done by resolutions adopted in a secret caucus behind closed doors.

Mr. President, I have an ineffable aversion to the secret caucus. I have felt the effect of the dirty work and damnable deeds that are intended to destroy and deceive which are perpetrated within its pernicious portals. I think it is undemocratic and violative of the very genius and spirit of our institutions. Feeling in that way about it, I should do violence to my conscience and sense of duty if I permitted myself to be tied by any order made in that way. I hold my commission from the people—the Democratic white people of Mississippi—and to them I shall give an accounting of my stewardship; and I shall not ask anybody outside of Mississippi for a certificate of regularity of my conduct when I go to give an account of my service to my masters, The people. And while I realize that—

> 'Tis not in mortals to command success:
> But we'll do more, Sempronius; we'll deserve it,

I have done my best in their behalf, and I shall accept their verdict without complaint.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, much has been said as to the political aspect of this matter, and very little has been said as to the merits of the motion. I want to say a word or two as to the merits of the motion.

The revenue bill has been reported to the Senate. It has been made the unfinished business. Usually, under those circumstances, it has the right of way until it is finished. It is a bill raising revenue to the amount of $200,000,000 with which to pay appropriations that have already been made by the Congress of the United States, and consequently it is an emergency measure. Evidently it is a measure which should be considered now, and which everybody recognizes must be considered and voted upon before the Congress adjourns.

On the other hand, the immigration bill, while I favor it, is not of the urgent nature of a bill raising revenue. We have not immigration of a great amount coming to the United States at the present time. We have not the great number of people who came here two and three years ago, nor are we likely to have until after December. Nay, more; we are not likely to have any considerable number for more than a year, or perhaps two years.

The fact that there is a shortage of labor in Europe, and will be a shortage of labor for years to come, on account of the deaths that have occurred there in the great European war, is going to make labor high priced in Europe, and that is going to keep them to a large extent from coming to the United States. So that there is nothing urgent in the bill with which it is now sought to displace the unfinished business of the Senate; but, on the other hand, we have an emergency bill in the fact that we must have the revenue, and the quicker we get it the better.

Mr. President, everybody is desirous that this session should end. It has been prolonged unnecessarily already. We can not adjourn this session without the consideration and passage of this revenue measure. It seems to me, under those conditions, no matter what my fealty may be to the immigration bill—I voted for the last one and I expect to vote for this one—I shall have to vote not to consider it as long as the revenue bill is the unfinished business before the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to make a few remarks about the vote which I cast yesterday upon the motion to proceed with the consideration of the immigration bill and about the vote which I shall cast on the pending motion to take it up for further consideration.

There was something said here yesterday about Democratic caucus action by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]; and later, during my enforced and temporary absence on official business from the Senate Chamber, as I learn this morning from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, there were some very caustic remarks made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] in regard to those Democratic Senators who voted yesterday to take up the immigration bill and proceed with its consideration. In view of those facts I desire to make some remarks about my action, my reasons for my votes, and my attitude in relation to the immigration bill. I endeavored to make these remarks in a Democratic senatorial caucus which was considering the bill, which I thought was the proper place to make them, but after several ineffectual attempts to obtain recognition from the caucus chairman I failed utterly to secure the floor, and I did not have the opportunity of making any statement there. I now make it to the Senate and to the open world.

It is true there was a Democratic senatorial caucus held on this bill. I went to that caucus, and was in attendance upon it at the beginning of its deliberations. I waited quite a while in order to be heard and to make the very statement which I am going to make now in regard to my attitude, because I thought that was the proper place to make it. But after four or five ineffectual attempts to gain recognition from the Chair I left the caucus, and felt that I was justified in leaving. I left before a vote was taken. At the time that I left a Senator was on the floor, speaking the second time, in violation of the rule which had been adopted that speeches should be limited to five minutes and that no Senator should speak the second time, while I had not been allowed the privilege of speaking at all. I felt that caucus was no place for me.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am intensely interested in the immigration bill and should like to get a vote on it as soon as possible. I have wondered for the last half hour whether the minority ought not to absent themselves from the Chamber while our Democratic friends compose their differences. I will ask the Senator from Montana if he would feel offended if the minority should retire?

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from New Hampshire is at perfect liberty to leave the Senate Chamber now and stay out all the rest of his life, as far as I am concerned. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator for the privilege.

Mr. MYERS. And all of those who wish may leave.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from New Hampshire is not in the habit of leaving the Chamber for a long period at any one time. The Senator from New Hampshire was simply wondering whether it might be less annoying to our Democratic friends if we were to retire.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator asked a question, and he got an answer, and he can regulate his conduct to suit himself. He is at perfect liberty to retire and stay out as long as he wants to, and at liberty to retire every time I take the floor, so far as I am concerned. I will say to him that I am entirely agreeable to having a vote taken on the pending motion as soon as I may quit talking, but not before.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suppose the Senator would not object to somebody else talking after he gets through?

Mr. MYERS. I have nothing to say about that. The Senator from New Hampshire can talk then as much as he may wish.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is not going to conclude the debate, probably, simply because he thinks he may.

Mr. MYERS. I am going to finish what I have to say, and anybody else may talk or retire, as he thinks would be most beneficial to the Senators who are present.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator for his courteous reply. I appreciate it.

Mr. MYERS. I gave the Senator a reply which I thought befitting to his question. I will now proceed to make my statement.

I have always voted for the immigration bill whenever it was up, and I have voted to pass it over the presidential veto whenever it was vetoed. I did it because I believed in it; because I believed it was right; because it was in accordance with my convictions. Months ago—I venture to say as much as six months or more ago—I began to receive dozens of resolutions and petitions from my State urging that the immigration bill be voted on at this session, and that I vote to take it up and dispose of it at this session of Congress. I received dozens of petitions, resolutions, memorials, and many individual letters to that effect. That began months ago, long before a Democratic caucus on the subject was dreamed of, by me at least. I never dreamed at that time that there would be a Democratic caucus on the subject. The idea had not occurred to me. It had not been suggested by anyone.

I have been here five years and a half, and I never before heard of caucus action on a program, on whether a bill should be taken up or not. I have known many Democratic caucuses to be held on how we should vote on a certain bill, on whether it should be supported by the Democratic Senators or not; but I never before in my experience here heard of Democratic caucus action on whether or not a bill should be taken up and proceeded with. I always understood that that was a matter for individual decision by the Senators. So, when I began to receive these letters and resolutions, I had no idea that there would be caucus action on the question of taking up the bill at this session, and I promptly gave my solemn promise to dozens and scores of my constituents—gave it in writing, over my signature, unqualifiedly, unequivocally—that I would vote to take up and pass the immigration bill at this session of Congress.

There was no qualification, no reservation, about my answers. There must now be two or three dozen of my letters held by constituents in my State, in writing, over my own signature, in which I solemnly promised to vote to take up the immigration bill and pass it at this session. I made those promises because I had a right to make them. There had been no intimation of caucus action at that time. Nobody had suggested that there might be a Democratic caucus on the subject of whether or not the bill should be taken up and put on its passage. I gave the promises because I had a right to give them, because I believed in them, because I believed that it was right, because it was in accordance with my convictions and within my rights. I thought it my duty to give the promises.

I never was any hand to say: "Well, I think this is right, but I will not do right now. I will do right some other time. I will not give you justice now. I will not give you your rights now. I will do what is right next December. I do not want to do what is right before the election. Just return us to power, and I will do what is right after the election." I never believed at all in taking that attitude. It does not commend itself to me. That has not been the rule of conduct which has governed my life. I have always believed that if a thing is right, now is the proper time to do it. Do what is right now, not at some other time.

Hence, I made these promises. They are in existence. They are being held and relied upon by my constituents. They are widespread over my State. They have gone to every section of my State. Now, when a Democratic caucus meets and decrees that this bill is not to be brought up for consideration at this session, what am I to do? My solemn, unqualified promise has been given to my constituents. Am I to keep my promise to my constituents, or am I to violate it?

I understand that, according to the rules of the Democratic caucus, if a Senator has made previous promises to his constituents, he is absolved from the action of the caucus. That rule alone absolves me from being governed by the action of the caucus in this instance. I understand that there is another rule of the caucus to the effect that a Senator is not bound in matters of conscience by the action of the caucus. That rule would absolve me, because I have conscientious scruples against violating my word. I entertain very strong conscientious scruples against violating my word; and when the question is put up to me, "Shall I keep my solemn promise to my constituents, made before the action of any Democratic caucus, or shall I violate it?" it does not take me a quarter of a second to decide what I shall do. It does not take me a quarter of a second to decide what is my duty.

I know not how other Senators may look upon it. I care not. I claim to be the sole and only judge of whether or not I shall keep my plighted word, my honor as an individual and as a public man, solemn and inviolate. I claim to be the sole judge of that privilege. I lay it before the other Senators here on both sides of this Chamber: If you had made a solemn promise to your constituents in regard to your public duties, and were confronted with the question whether or not you should violate it, what would you do? I leave the decision of that question to each and every Senator here individually for himself. If there be any Senator here who has given his solemn word or promise to his constituents, and he be confronted with the question of whether he shall keep it or violate it, I leave it to him and his conscience and his judgment as to whether he shall keep or violate his word. That is for him to decide and for him to reconcile with his conscience as he may be able. It is not for me to do it. If he wants to keep his promise or if he wants to violate it, that is a matter that concerns him and his constituents, and is not a matter for me to censor, and I claim the same privilege. Others may decide it as they wish. Others may equivocate, may consider themselves excused or absolved by subsequent conditions, but I claim that it is my duty to keep my word, both in public and in private life, and I claim it is my duty to keep my solemn word in public life just as much as in private life. A man who will not keep his word in public life is not fit to be in public life. A man who will not keep his word in public life will not keep his word in private life; and a man who will not keep his word is no man at all. Sink or swim, survive or perish, come what may, in public life or private life, politically or personally, be the consequences what they may, no matter what others may do, as for me, I shall under all circumstances always keep my word.

For a good many years I have made it a supreme rule of my life to keep my word inviolate in private life. I consider that the rule in public life should be the same. I think a man should put his word above everything else in this world, and I feel that I am now getting too old to begin to violate my solemn word; and I am not going to do it, whether anybody else may like it or not.

When I first came here, in fact, upon my way here to take a seat as a Member of this body, I made a promise to some of my constituents that I would not vote to bring up a certain tariff schedule for revision until the report of the Tariff Commission, which had been investigating it, had been made and was laid before Congress. Other members of my party in this body, when the question arose, voted to take up the schedule immediately for consideration and revision.

In accordance with my promise, I voted against taking it up immediately, and I was soundly condemned by some people for doing so. I admit I made an inadvertent promise in that case, but I stuck to it, regardless of how it was made. In that case, I probably made a mistake by promising to put off something which the people wanted. In this case, from the standpoint of some self-constituted critics, I seem to have made a mistake, according to their judgment, in voting not to put off what the people want. Between the two, if any mistake at all is to be made, I would rather take a chance on making a mistake in voting against putting off what the people want than to make it in voting to put off what the people want. I claim that a man in public life never makes a mistake in voting to take up at the present time what the people want. If the people want it they are entitled to it, and he makes no mistake in voting to give to the people at once what they want immediately.

If I am any judge, the people of this country want an immigration bill with a literacy test now. They have wanted it for many years, as evidenced by the tremendous majorities given in favor of it time and time again by both branches of Congress, and they still want it; and, in my judgment, I made no mistake, I committed no wrong, I did not err months ago in promising to vote to take up and pass the immigration bill at this session. Whether I did or not, my word is out, my solemn, plighted word, and I put that above all caucus action of any party, and the caucus itself puts it above caucus action. Furthermore, the immigration bill is not a party question. No mention is made of it in this year's Democratic national platform. It is not a party matter. However, a Democratic House passed it at this session by a tremendous majority. So it can not be un-Democratic.

So I voted yesterday in accordance with my word, and I am going to continue to do it as long as I am a Member of this body. If the occasion ever arises where I have to choose between remaining a Member of this body and keeping my word, I am going every time to keep my word. I may retire from this body. I may be retired, I may quit public life, but when I quit public life I am not going to permit it to be said truthfully that I violated my word or violated a promise to my constituents. That is something that can never be written in my political epitaph. I would rather resign from this body and retire to private life now than to break my word to my constituents. To resign would be no discredit, but to break my word to constitutents would be a lasting disgrace. I never have done it and I never will do it.

Those are the reasons why I voted as I did yesterday, and I do not believe that any right-thinking man can do otherwise than approve my action when he takes into consideration all the circumstances. If he does, if any man thinks I ought to have violated my word, ought to have broken my promise to my constituents, he is at liberty to think so and to continue thinking so. I shall not agree with him and shall square my own conduct to my promises and my conscience. This is the first and only time during my service here that I have been at variance with a caucus of my party. I have stayed with my party in its great legislative program about as well as anybody here, because I thought it right. This is the first time I have been out of accord with caucus action, and this time it is not my fault, because caucus action was taken after I had made promises which I had a right to make and must keep.

There is another reason why I was justified in not being bound by the action of the caucus. When the caucus was held which passed on this matter, I endeavored four or five times to get recognition of the Chair and state the views which I have stated here and ask the caucus what in the opinion of the caucus was my duty. But I failed to get recognition, and after I had attempted unsuccessfully four or five times to get recognition I picked up my hat and walked out of the caucus, feeling that I had no place there, and I was not there when the vote was had. I do not believe any Senator ought to be bound by a caucus in which he has neither voice nor vote. I did not vote. I had left for reasons which appeared sufficient to me; and on that ground, too, I am not bound by the action of the caucus.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], for whom I have high regard, who used such caustic language yesterday, had at the very beginning of the caucus been recognized, as he is always promptly recognized in caucus. I have never seen him have any difficulty in getting recognition. He made a long talk, giving his views, and then, sitting right across the aisle from me, after he had talked, when I had had no opportunity to talk, after making four or five attempts, the Senator from Missouri was one of the loudest to clamor for a vote and to cut off further and useless debate, as he expressed it. He clamored vociferously for a "vote, vote," after he had said all he wanted to say, while I was trying to get the floor.

I want to say to Democratic Senators here, if you want me to go into a Democratic caucus and be bound by it, it would be the part of policy, if not of wisdom, to give me a chance to express my views, along with other Senators who are older at the business than I am. If not, you have no right to consider me bound.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. JONES. Will the Senator kindly state who presided over the caucus?

Mr. MYERS. If any Democratic Senator should ask me that question, I am willing to answer, but I do not think it is a proper question from the Republican side. I do not think it concerns the other side.

I have said as much as I feel it is my right and my duty to say, and beyond that I will not go. I merely have stated so much of what occurred in the caucus as I believed, in my judgment, necessary, fit, proper, and appropriate to state. I do not desire to state more; but I think that if Democratic Senators want us to be bound by the caucus they should so conduct their caucuses that each and every Senator on the floor of the caucus, whether an old Senator or not, has an equal right to be heard there. There can not justly be taxation without representation, and in a caucus no one can be justly bound without a voice in the proceedings. However, I waive that in this instance, and base my vote of yesterday to take up the immigration bill and the one I shall cast to-day on a higher ground of previous promises to constituents.

I want to state further, while I am on the floor, in regard to the program for this session, that I read in a Washington newspaper a few mornings ago the startling information that certain Democratic Senators and certain Republican Senators had gotten together and agreed that the Owen corrupt-practices bill should not be considered at this session, and that it should go over until the next session, in December. I do not know how much truth there is in that report. I have not been consulted about it, but I want to say openly and boldly now that if there is any such agreement I shall not be bound by it. I do not believe in any such hocus-pocus juggling with the business of the Senate. I do not believe it is just to the American people; I do not believe it is just to the constituents whom I represent, if there be any truth in it. I am in favor of the Owen corrupt-practices bill. I am in favor of its being considered and enacted at this session of Congress. I am in favor of its being considered now, because now is the accepted time; because it is right and because it is needed now, and it will not be needed for four years after the 7th of November. Away with such dallying with the people's right, such trifling with needed legislation! It would be a farce to put it off until the December session.

I have no patience with any such sentiment—any plan or agreement which would take needed legislation, badly needed right now at this particular time, and put it over until after the election, when it could not do any harm to either political party for four years. I am against such a proceeding. If I get an opportunity, I shall vote to take up and pass the Owen corrupt practices bill at this session.

Something has been said by some of the Senators this morning about the desire to end this session. I tell you, my fellow Democratic Senators, in my opinion it is a great deal more important that we stay here and finish the work that we have promised to the people of the country than it is to adjourn and get away in a hurry. It is a great deal more important and essential to the success of the Democratic Party, in my opinion, that we stay here and do our duty and give the people the measures which have been promised to them rather than it is to quit in a hurry and go home in order to take our own ease and look after our reelection. I say duty first.

In conclusion, I want to thank the amiable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], for whom I have very high esteem, for the courtesy of staying here and listening to my humble remarks and not retiring, as he must have been tempted to do. I can not attribute his remaining to any fascination or interest in my poor remarks, but it must have been due solely to the courtesy which always characterizes him, and I thank him for it. I appreciate his courtesy.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement by way of personal explanation. I did not hear the remarks of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] yesterday in connection with Senate bill 5886, a bill extending the time for the completion of the bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn., authorized by an act entitled "An act to amend an act approved July 20, 1912, entitled 'An act to authorize the Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River,' approved August 23, 1912."

I wish to assure the Senator from Arkansas and the Senate that I moved to concur in the amendments of the House purely as a matter of routine. If I had known that he intended to ask for further action on the bill I would certainly not have made the motion.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] justifies me in saying just a word. Under the practice in the Committee on Commerce, what are known as bridge bills, giving authority to build bridges across navigable streams under the terms laid down in the general bridge act, go, as a matter of course, after they have been passed upon by a subcommittee consisting of three members of the Committee on Commerce. The Senator from Texas is the chairman of that committee. The authority under which the subcommittee exists is as follows:

> That bridge bills shall be referred to a Subcommittee on Bridges, with authority, in event they agree and there is no contest, to report the same to the Senate.

That implies, of course, that a bridge bill will be submitted to the Senators from the State affected by it. It is not intended to give to any Senator the right to bring those bridge bills forward without consultation with those directly interested in the matter.

I thought I had taken such steps as would afford me an opportunity to confer with my colleague and the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] about that particular bill, and I was quite surprised when I found it had been disposed of on Saturday evening when very few Senators were here and I was absent. I suppose the Senator from Texas had some reason for doing it, and I did not imply otherwise in the statement I made. I want to say to him now I think the judgment of the Committee on Commerce is that whenever a bridge bill is presented he should consult the Senators from the State affected by the provisions of the bill before he presents it to the Senate, and I am sure he will do that.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to say that I am glad to have these matters called to my attention by the Senator from Arkansas, and that I shall endeavor hereafter to observe the rule to which he refers.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to proceed to the consideration of the immigration bill to the displacement of the revenue bill, which is the unfinished business. On yesterday the whole day was consumed in a discussion more or less relevant to that motion and this morning we have occupied nearly an hour and a half in a discussion with reference to that simple motion.

Without taking sides in the controversy that we have had and without expressing any opinion about the merits of the controversy, I feel, Mr. President, that enough of the time of the Senate and of the country has been taken up in this discussion, a large part of which I think it would have been better if it had not taken place at all. I regret many things that have been said; I wish they had not been said; but both sides have had their opportunity. Senators have been given a liberal time in which to express their views and the difficulty between the two contending factions seem this morning to have been more or less adjusted.

I hope, Mr. President, that we may now without further discussion have a vote upon the question. If the Senate desires to displace the revenue bill and take up the immigration bill let us do that and go on with the business of the country. If, on the other hand, the Senate shall vote against doing that, then we can go on with the business of the country in connection with necessary revenue legislation.

I trust that no Senator on this side will prolong the discussion.

Mr. HARDWICK. I believe we are ready to vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I ask for a vote.

Mr. HARDWICK. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. PENROSE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HARDWICK. I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia suggests the absence of a quorum and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Harding	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Hardwick	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Hitchcock	Oliver	Smoot
Brandegee	Hughes	Overman	Stone
Bryan	Husting	Owen	Taggart
Chamberlain	Jones	Penrose	Thomas
Chilton	Kenon	Phelan	Thompson
Clarke, Ark.	Kern	Pittman	Vardaman
Culberson	Lane	Robinson	Warren
Cummins	Lee, Md.	Saulsbury	Weeks
Curtis	McCumber	Shafroth	Williams
Dillingham	McLean	Sheppard
Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, the question, as I understand, is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the immigration bill. Is that right?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to proceed to the consideration of House bill 10384, commonly known as the immigration bill.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I think that at this session of Congress the Senate should take up and discuss and pass an immigration bill. I think that the country expects its enactment, and I believe it will be beneficial; but I do not believe, and at no time have I believed, that it should displace any other measure of consequence or importance while such measure is being considered by the Senate. The vote I cast on yesterday in favor of taking up the immigration bill was merely in accordance with my desire to have that bill brought up and considered by the Senate. I had in answer to many letters assured people writing to me from the State which I in part represent that I would vote in favor of the consideration of that bill, and the action I took yesterday was taken for no other reason than that I believed it was the proper thing to do. I think, in a general way, the country expects the passage of a measure of that kind; and, quite regardless of the opinion of anyone or of the criticism of anyone, I voted that way with the conviction that I was performing my duty.

It is my opinion that "that man serves his party best who serves his country best." I think that is a good party precept to follow. It does not make much difference to me—it never has, and it never will in the future—as to the source from which proposed legislation comes. I do not care whether it comes from the standpat or progressive Republican side of the Chamber or the Democratic side; I do not care much whether or not the caucus indorses it (I did not attend the caucus), although I am glad to have their indorsement, but I will accept a good measure or a good amendment from any source, irrespective of the politics of the man who presents it. If it is of value to the country, then it is of value to the party of which I am a member, no matter who proposes it. I would accept it from his satanic majesty if he brought it white hot out of hades on a shovel as soon as it cooled off enough to enable me to take hold of it [laughter], and thank him for it. I would even accept it from the Senator from Missouri—after carefully looking it over—and thank him.

This is my position: The only interest I have in the matter is to secure good legislation if possible. I will not, however, vote to bring up the immigration bill at this time, for the reason that I think the right of way belongs to another bill, namely, the revenue bill; but just as soon as that bill is out of the way, I shall by my vote and otherwise do what I can to bring on this floor for consideration the immigration bill, and help fight it out to a finish.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to proceed to the consideration of the immigration bill. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. He is not present, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S name was called). I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is necessarily absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when Mr. LODGE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. LODGE] is unavoidably absent. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when Mr. POINDEXTER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is necessarily absent. If he were present my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. STONE (when Mr. REED'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. REED] is necessarily away and will be so for three or four days. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and vote "nay."

Mr. SHAFROTH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I have been unable to secure a transfer, and I therefore withhold my vote by reason of that fact. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], who is away from the city, to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMPSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (when Mr. TOWNSEND'S name was called). I have previously announced the reason for the absence of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BANKHEAD (when Mr. UNDERWOOD'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is temporarily absent from the Chamber. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CLARK of Wyoming], who is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I have a pair for the week with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], but I am released from that pair on this vote, and therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the negative). Before I transferred my pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] had announced a pair with him and refrained from voting. I see that the Senator from Ohio is not in the Chamber and has not voted. Therefore I think, in deference to the situation, I should withdraw the transfer and not have my vote recorded. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON. I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. In his absence I can not vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote strategically "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (after having voted in the negative). During the temporary absence of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] I transferred my pair to him. As he has returned to the Chamber, I ask to withdraw my vote, as he is desirous of voting himself and as I can not obtain another pair.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have been requested to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. If the Senator from Montana were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BORAH. My colleague [Mr. BRADY] is necessarily absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 32, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, what I shall have to say at this stage of this debate will be largely in the nature of a statement, and, as I desire that statement to be accurate, I have reduced it to writing. For that reason I hope I may be permitted to proceed without interruption, although I will not decline to answer any question that Senators may see fit to ask, pertinent to the subject which I am discussing at the time of the inquiry.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

The appropriations for the fiscal year 1917, according to a statement furnished me by the Treasury Department, August 19, 1916, aggregate $1,572,008,728.

This aggregate includes all appropriations passed up to this time, includes the amount carried in the Army and Navy and District of Columbia bills not yet signed by the President, and $19,000,000 carried in the general deficiency bill now pending before the House Committee on Appropriations, and $2,000,000 miscellaneous appropriations now pending in the House. It does not include the $50,000,000 provided in the shipping bill for purchase and construction of ships nor the $20,000,000 provided for the construction of a nitrate plant. These two items are to be financed as provided in the law of their creation—by the issuance of Panama Canal bonds.

Now, let me repeat that the total appropriations for the fiscal year 1917, including those made or to be made by Congress, as I have before stated, will amount to $1,572,008,728. Deduct from this amount postal appropriations and postal deficiencies payable from postal revenues and the sinking-fund requirement included in permanent appropriations, aggregating $386,471,900, and the amount estimated by the Treasury Department that will not be expended during the year under the general rule, allowing 5 per cent of the total amount appropriated as the probable amount that will not be disbursed during the year, $59,293,828, making a total of $445,765,728, and a balance will be left of $1,126,243,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he has estimated the general deficiency bill, which is yet to follow, and if that is included in his figures?

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated that in the estimated appropriations there was included the general deficiency bill hereafter to be passed.

Mr. WARREN. At what amount, please?

Mr. SIMMONS. Nineteen million dollars.

Mr. WARREN. It will be very much more than that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, I do not know. That is the amount furnished me by the Treasury Department. I also included the deficiency bills passed March 31 and July 1, 1916, carrying $53,000,000.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? I do not intend to interrupt the Senator, as I know he does not want to be interrupted, but it is rather difficult to hear him over here. I should like to ask him what was the date of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to which he referred in his opening remarks?

Mr. SIMMONS. August 19, 1916—last week.

Mr. PENROSE. Is it an itemized statement?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; this is just a general statement, as I have given it to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. Has the Senator the original statement?

Mr. SIMMONS. No. It is a memorandum furnished me by the department.

Mr. PENROSE. It would be very interesting to have the items of the statement, and if the Senator has them I intend to ask for them.

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated, if the Senator will permit me, that the aggregate amount which I gave included all appropriations made up to this time, including the amounts carried in the Army and Navy and District of Columbia bills not yet signed by the President, and $19,000,000 carried in the general deficiency bill now pending in the House Committee on Appropriations, and $2,000,000 of miscellaneous appropriations now pending in the House; but that it did not include the $50,000,000 carried by the ship-purchase bill nor the $20,000,000 provided for the construction of a nitrate plant.

POSTAL DEDUCTION.

With reference to the deduction of postal expenses it may be stated that as a rule the postal receipts about equal postal expenses. Sometimes there is a surplus and sometimes there is a deficit. All appropriation bills, as does this one, provide for possible deficiencies in postal appropriations. During the fiscal year 1916 the postal receipts exceeded postal expenditures, and on August 19—last Saturday—the Postmaster General turned into the Treasury $5,200,000 of surplus receipts for the fiscal year 1916. It is believed that postal receipts during this fiscal year will again exceed expenditures, and that there will be a still larger surplus than for the fiscal year 1916.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator on what that belief is based?

Mr. SIMMONS. That belief is based upon the fact that during the past fiscal year we had a surplus of something over $5,000,000, and I can see no reason why there should be any decrease in postal receipts. On the contrary, I have an abiding faith that this year is going to be a very prosperous one and that the receipts will probably be larger.

Mr. WEEKS. Of course postal receipts depend almost entirely on the condition of business. In fact, they reflect the condition of business. If you have a banner year's business, the postal receipts are large; otherwise, they are small.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. But as a matter of fact the postal receipts have only exceeded the expenditures, I think, 3 years in the last 30 years.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. They exceeded them this year, however, by over five millions.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; they did.

Mr. SIMMONS. And I am advised that there has been an excess of postal receipts during each of the last three years. I have not confirmed that statement.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will correct that. I am advised that during two of the preceding three years there has been a surplus in the postal receipts.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the Senator objects to a proper interruption I will not interrupt him.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator sees that if I yield to these interruptions the continuity of this statement will be entirely broken up; but I shall not object.

Mr. PENROSE. This bears so immediately on what the Senator has referred to that I should like to make the inquiry. On page 71 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, we read, under the heading "Postal Service," as follows:

The Post Office Department estimates that the postal revenues for the fiscal year 1917 will probably amount to $316,000,000, with expenditures for the Postal Service for the same period under existing laws of $324,000,000.

That would indicate a deficit of several million dollars in the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SIMMONS. Those estimates were made last October. Since that time it has developed as a fact that there was a surplus of over $5,000,000. Of course the Postmaster General can not look to the end of the year when he is in the middle of it.

SINKING-FUND DEDUCTION.

These appropriations, Mr. President—I have to go back now, because the continuity of the statement has been broken, and I am now referring to the total appropriations—these appropriations, as usual, carry an appropriation for the sinking fund, this year amounting to $60,000,000. This has been done ever since 1869; but, as is well known, and therefore unnecessary that I should spend any time about it, this amount is never included in the estimate of disbursements, because the amount is never actually disbursed; it is a mere matter of bookkeeping in the Treasury Department, which, I assume, is well understood.

There is always a difference between the amount appropriated and the amount actually disbursed, and, as a result of long experience, the Treasury Department estimates that this difference will average about 5 per cent of total appropriations. This year, after a thorough investigation among all the departments and offices which are to disburse these appropriations, the Treasury Department estimates that of the total appropriations $59,293,828 will not be expended during the fiscal year 1917, this being witnin a few thousand dollars of the 5 per cent rule usually adopted. This investigation and resultant estimate was made by the department at my request, because of my desire that this statement should be accurate.

Now, making the deductions for the postal expenditures and sinking-fund requirement and the estimated amount that will not be expended during the fiscal year 1917, we have left as the estimated total disbursements for the fiscal year 1917, $1,126,243,000.

For a clearer and more thorough understanding of the financial situation which we are now discussing, it is well to understand what part of these estimated expenditures are for normal current expenditures, what part is to meet the requirements of our preparedness program, and what part is to defray the expenses incident to the Mexican situation, involving the mobilization of the National Guard and the operation of our troops along the border and in Mexico for the six months ending December 31, 1916. In order to make this statement not only full but accurate, I have asked the Treasury Department to give me a statement of the expenses incident to the Military Establishment showing the increased appropriations for this fiscal year in excess of the estimated normal increase, what part of these increased appropriations represents preparedness, and what part represents expenditures on account of the Mexican situation, and in pursuance of that request it has furnished me with the following statement:

RÉSUMÉ.

Appropriations for Mexican situation	$130,000,000
Appropriations for preparedness	96,926,000
Total appropriation Mexican situation and preparedness	226,926,000

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, if it will not embarrass the Senator, I should like to ask him a question which will have direct application to that statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEEKS. For how many troops now doing duty on the Mexican border does that appropriation provide?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am unable to answer the question. The department did not furnish that detail.

Mr. WEEKS. The reason why I ask the question is that for the past two months there have been about 100,000 National Guardsmen there; but additional men are being sent there—some twenty-five or thirty thousand—and I wondered if it applied to all the men from all the States who have been called into the service, or simply those who are now doing duty on the border. I was going to ask, further, if the Senator knew what the policy was to be about keeping those men on the border indefinitely.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am unable to answer the question of the Senator as to the policy of the Government with reference to that. As I have stated before, in the estimate made by the department in December, 1915, before this Mexican situation arose, they included $67,000,000 for preparedness. In their subsequent estimate made to Congress, and in pursuance of which Congress increased the appropriations $159,000,000, they included $130,000,000 to finance the Mexican situation up to December 31, 1916, and $29,000,000 additional for preparedness.

EXPLANATION OF TABLE.

From this statement it will be seen that the aggregate appropriations on account of the Military Establishment, including Army, fortifications, sundry civil, Military Academy, and deficiencies, either already appropriated or provided for in the pending deficiency bill, amount to $341,315,000.

It will also be seen that on December 6, 1915, before the Mexican situation reached the stage calling for the punitive expedition into Mexico and the mobilization of the National Guard, the department had estimated that the total appropriations on account of the Military Establishment (including $67,832,000 for preparedness, would amount only to $182,221,000. By reason of the Mexican situation and the necessity for an additional amount for preparedness, the department later increased its estimate of December, 1915, and Congress appropriated, in pursuance of these new estimates, the additional sum of $159,094,000, $130,000,000 of the amount being for the Mexican situation and $29,094,000 for general preparedness purposes. This latter sum, when added to the $67,832,000 in the department's estimate of December 6, 1915, make the total amounts carried in the final appropriations for preparedness $96,926,000.

Adding the $96,926,000 for preparedness to the $130,000,000 for the Mexican situation shows that the increase in the appropriation for the Military Establishment on account of preparedness and the Mexican situation amounts to $226,926,000.

Increase in naval appropriations for preparedness purposes, 1917 over 1916.

Increase in naval appropriations, 1917 over 1916		$167,065,000
Average increase in appropriations for fiscal years 1910 to 1916 was $2,121,000 a year; this amount deducted from the increase for 1917		2,121,000
Increase in naval appropriations due to preparedness		164,944,000

As shown by the above table, the increase in the appropriations for the Navy for preparedness purposes is $164,944,000. To this add the increased appropriations for Military Establishment—$226,926,000—and we have an aggregated increase of appropriations due to preparedness and the Mexican situation of $391,870,000. Deducting 5 per cent from this, the usual amount estimated will be unexpended during the year $19,590,000, and we have left $372,280,000 as the estimated disbursements for the fiscal year on account of the Mexican situation and preparedness.

This amount deducted from the total estimated disbursements—$1,126,243,000—for the fiscal year 1917 would leave $753,963,000 as the amount required to meet the total normal disbursements of the Government for that year. Now, the total estimated receipts for the year 1917 under existing laws, as is shown in the statement of the Treasury Department filed with the report of the committee, is $762,000,000, or $8,037,000 more than the estimated normal disbursements, making it clear that but for the extraordinary increases in the appropriations for the Naval and Military Establishments which have been thought expedient and necessary on account of the emergencies of the present situation, the normal receipts of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1917 under existing law would be sufficient to pay the expenses of the Government for that year and leave a surplus of over $8,000,000 in the Treasury, just as the receipts for the year 1916, before we entered upon this preparedness program and before the Mexican situation developed, actually yielded a sufficient revenue to pay the expenses of the Government and left a surplus in the Treasury of $55,270,000—net ordinary.

It is therefore obvious from this statement that the necessity for this legislation is due to the extraordinary expenses of the Mexican situation and the broad program of preparedness upon which we have decided to enter.

Now, as to the balance, after deducting ordinary receipts, and how we propose to raise it:

As I have shown before, if you subtract from the estimated disbursements for the year 1917 the estimated receipts for the year 1917 we will have a balance to be otherwise provided for of $364,243,000. It is estimated that the pending bill will yield $205,000,000; amount to be otherwise provided for, $159,243,000. Deduct from this the amount required to meet the Mexican situation to be financed by bonds, $130,000,000, and we have a balance to be provided from the general fund of $29,243,000.

The general fund on the 16th day of August amounted to $134,337,895, and it is estimated that this amount can be taken from that fund without serious embarrassment to the Treasury.

In connection with the proposed bond issue to cover the Mexican expenditures I wish to advert to the attempt being made to create the impression that the suggestion made in the report of the Committee on Finance that this sum be financed by bonds was a new and unexpected suggestion. There is no foundation for these misleading statements.

As a matter of fact, before the bill was introduced in the House this subject was discussed, and it was then decided that this expenditure should be met by a bond issue, and accordingly the Committee on Ways and Means of the House in its report of July 5 made substantially the same statement with reference to this matter made in the report of the Committee on Finance. The financial statement then filed by the Ways and Means Committee shows, as does the report of the Finance Committee, that $130,000,000 of the increased appropriations for the Army was to be paid by the issuance of bonds.

The Secretary of the Treasury has authority, as is well known, to issue Panama bonds to reimburse the Treasury for amounts paid on account of the Panama Canal out of the current funds during the years of its construction, and it is understood that in pursuance of this authority these expenses will be provided for by the sale of such of these bonds as may be required for that purpose.

Fortunately, the Democratic Party has had no occasion at any time to issue Panama bonds. It has been able to pay all canal expenses from the current receipts. The Republican Party, not being so fortunate with its finances, found it necessary and advisable, on several occasions, both under Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Taft, to issue Panama bonds to pay the expenses of that work.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I believe in all it has issued and sold about $134,000,000. As before stated, we have never issued a single dollar's worth of these bonds to reimburse the Treasury in accordance with the Panama Canal act.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator has undertaken to put a partisan flavor in his statistics, which, perhaps, justifies me in addressing an inquiry to him as to whether the Panama Canal was not largely completed when the Democratic Party took control of the Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. So there was no occasion to issue bonds; and the fact that the bonds were unissued is a magnificent tribute to the thrift and economy of the Republican Party.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not yield to the Senator for a speech. I hope the Senator will allow me to proceed.

Mr. PENROSE. That was the splendid legacy left to the Democratic Party. But I rose more particularly to ask the Senator whether he contends that the Secretary of the Treasury can issue these Panama Canal bonds for the shipping board, for the war on the border, and for every other purpose that he may see fit, or whether it would not require additional authority of law?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, answering the last inquiry of the Senator, I say without hesitation there is no question about the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury under the act to issue these bonds for this purpose.

Mr. PENROSE. To which act does the Senator refer?

Mr. SIMMONS. There are several of those acts. I can not specify them.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator say that——

Mr. SIMMONS. There is not any question, Mr. President, about the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue Panama bonds for the purpose of reimbursing the Treasury for the amount that has been expended out of the current funds of the Government for Panama Canal purposes.

Mr. PENROSE. I think——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has asked his question, and I prefer to answer it, if he will permit me.

Mr. PENROSE. All right.

Mr. SIMMONS. In answer to the further statement of the Senator that the canal was largely completed at the time the Democrats came into power, of course in a general way that is true, but it was not completed, and since the beginning of this administration we have taken out of the ordinary current funds of the Government and applied to the discharge of Panama Canal expenses $84,000,000.

I do not know how much of the $130,000,000 estimated for the Mexican situation will have to be spent. If the present situation continues until the 1st of January, 1917, it is probable that practically the whole amount estimated will have to be spent. If it terminates before then, the amount will be less, but no more bonds will be issued than necessary to defray the actual expenses, and that will depend upon how long the present situation will continue on the border and in Mexico.

The Republican Party, not only in this Chamber but in the country at large, is making strenuous, almost frenzied, efforts to make the people believe that the increase in the appropriations of this Congress are made necessary by, and are the result of, reckless extravagance and wastefulness on the part of the Democratic Party and the Congress.

There is no foundation for this charge. Even a superficial analysis will show that it can not honestly be made. Manifestly it is an effort of the opposition in a presidential campaign to capitalize the financial demands growing out of an extraordinary situation for political capital.

This charge of extravagance involves two questions:

First. Whether this increased appropriation on account of preparedness and the Mexican situation, carrying $393,991,000, is an extravagant appropriation for the purposes for which it is made, and that necessarily involves the question of whether the purpose itself is an unworthy one.

Second. Whether the appropriations for the fiscal year 1917 for purely normal purposes is wasteful and extravagant.

Let us first consider these charges as they relate to preparedness appropriations. What was and is the attitude of the Republican Party in this Chamber with respect to these appropriations? What was and is the attitude of that party in the country as represented by its most distinguished leaders, among them the present Republican candidate for the Presidency and ex-President Roosevelt? What is to be the attitude of that party upon this question in the present national campaign? Does the Republican Party propose to put itself in the attitude of opposition to the necessary appropriation and expenditure for preparedness and for defense on the border and in Mexico? Does that party wish the country to understand that it has taken the back track upon the question of preparedness; that it has taken the back track upon the question of sending the punitive expedition into Mexico; that it has taken the back track upon the question of the mobilization of our forces to meet the situation which was created in Mexico and in the United States as the result of the Columbus and other raids and as a result of our punitive expedition in Mexico?

Did the Republican Party in this Chamber, when the Army bill, carrying $166,500,000 in addition to the usual appropriation, assail these additional appropriations as extravagant and unnecessary? On the contrary, did not the leaders of that party in this Chamber then insist upon a larger program involving a much larger expenditure, and was not the inadequacy of the program, and of these appropriations, the gravamen of their complaint and criticism of this measure?

What was the attitude of the Republican Party in this Chamber with respect to the great increases made in the naval bill in the Senate?

It is a matter of common knowledge that upon both of these measures leaders on the other side insisted upon larger appropriations for these purposes than was made instead of lesser ones. How many Republicans on the other side of the Chamber voted against these bills? The RECORD shows that there was no division on the final passage of the Army bill, which means that the vote was unanimous in favor of the bill. Upon the naval bill there were 71 yeas and 8 nays. The nays were Senators CLAPP, CURTIS, GRONNA, LA FOLLETTE, NORRIS, THOMAS, VARDAMAN, and WORKS.

Now let us consider briefly the question of whether the increases in the appropriations for normal purposes for the fiscal year 1917 are excessive or extravagant as compared with appropriations during the last 10 or 15 years. We have seen that, deducting the appropriations incident to preparedness and the Mexican situation, confining ourselves to normal appropriations for 1917, the estimated appropriations for that year will, upon that basis, exceed those of 1916 by $52,000,000, and that twelve millions of this increase is due to good roads and rural credits.

Now let us compare this increase with the increases of the 10 preceding years—some Republican and some Democratic years.

For the purpose of showing the increase in appropriations, exclusive of postal and sinking fund, beginning with the fiscal year 1906 and ending with the fiscal year 1917, I attach hereto a table showing the total amount appropriated in each year, and the decreases and increases:

Total annual appropriations, exclusive of postal and postal deficiencies paid from postal receipts, and the sinking-fund requirement.

Fiscal year.	Total appropriations.	Increase over previous year.	Decrease over previous year.
1906	$579,078,097
1907	632,510,567	$53,432,470
1908	648,625,764	16,115,197
1909	723,710,542	75,084,778
1910	748,287,759	24,577,217
1911	733,725,390		$14,562,369
1912	703,125,485		30,599,901
1913	689,938,602		13,186,884
1914	751,597,940	61,659,338
1915	744,977,032		6,620,908
1916	739,522,066		5,454,966
1917	[1] 793,667,000	[1] 54,145,000

[1] Estimated increase, excluding increase due to preparedness and Mexican situation.

From this statement it will be seen that the appropriations for the fiscal year 1914, made during the Taft administration, are the largest ever made up to that time during our whole history, except probably during the Civil War.

The next largest appropriation shown was during the Republican year of 1910, when the amount appropriated reached $748,286,759, being only about three millions less than that for 1914.

An analysis of this table will show that the average annual increase in appropriations made under the Republican administration from 1906 to 1914 was $21,565,000. It will also show that in the appropriations from 1914 to 1916, made under the Democratic administration, there was an annual average decrease instead of an increase in appropriations of $6,048,000. It will also show that, including the fiscal year 1917, estimated upon the basis of normal appropriations for that year, there is an average annual increase for the three Democratic (annual appropriations for the fiscal) years 1915, 1916, and 1917 of $14,023,000.

Putting it in another form, an analysis of this table will show that during the six years of Republican power in all branches of the Government from 1906 to 1912 the average annual increase in appropriations was $20,674,000, or 3.5 per cent; two years of a Republican Senate and President and a Democratic House, 1912 to 1914, the average annual increase was $24,236,000, or 3.4 per cent; three years of Democratic control in all branches of the Government, from 1914 to 1917, an average annual increase in normal appropriations of $14,023,000, or 1.86 per cent.

The annual increase in the population of the United States is a trifle less than 2 per cent, which is smaller than the average annual increase in the appropriation shown in the foregoing statement for the Republican years, but not smaller than the average normal increase shown for the Democratic years.

I have heretofore shown, I think, that there was no extravagance in connection with the $391,870,000 appropriated for preparedness and the Mexican situation; that the question with respect to those appropriations was one of policy and not of extravagance.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator——

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I am not going to be interrupted now.

Mr. PENROSE. I knew that the Senator was on shaky ground and I am not surprised at him.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Senator sees I am finishing a statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina declines to yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the figures I have just quoted show that upon the basis of comparison with the appropriations of the last 11 years there is no ground for the charge of extravagance in the appropriations for either the fiscal years 1915, 1916, or 1917 under the Democrats.

In the light of these figures, if the Republican Senators insist that these appropriations are extravagant, they should state in what particular they are regarded as extravagant and what has been their attitude and votes with reference to the specific instances of alleged extravagance.

We are entitled to specification; we have had only general charges and vague hints. Neither they nor their candidate for the Presidency have done more than to make broad and general statements based on the fact that the appropriations for the year 1917, including all this preparedness program, is in excess of that of former years; and, instead of specifications, they are throwing out vague hints of pork-barrel legislation and like innuendos.

In connection with this Republican charge of extravagance, invented and promulgated for purely political purposes, a great deal has been said about the Republican surpluses and Democratic deficits.

I have taken the trouble to look into this matter of surplus and deficits somewhat, and I find a very remarkable situation with respect to surplus and deficits dependent upon the total annual receipts of the Government by referring to page 235, report of the Secretary of the Treasury, 1915.

I find, beginning with Mr. Cleveland's first administration, that during his four years there were two surpluses and two deficits.

I find that there were deficits during each of the four years under Mr. Harrison's administration.

I find that during Mr. Cleveland's second term there were two deficits and two surpluses.

I find that under Mr. McKinley's administration there was one deficit and three surpluses.

I find that under Mr. Roosevelt's first administration there were two deficits and two surpluses.

I find that under Mr. Roosevelt's second term there were two deficits and two surpluses.

I find that under Mr. Taft's administration there was one deficit and three surpluses.

I find that Mr. Wilson has had two surpluses and one deficit.

I further find that during the last 10 years of the Republican administration the total deficits exceed the total surpluses by about $68,000,000.

It has been a favorite Republican suggestion, repeated in the report of the minority of the Finance Committee on this bill, when assailing the emergency bills and other revenue legislation of this administration, to contend that if we had the Payne-Aldrich tariff it would not be necessary to resort to such legislation as is now proposed in order to raise the money to meet the expenses of the Government, including preparedness, and that it would not be necessary to increase taxes upon incomes and to levy a tax upon inheritances, munitions, and so forth, as proposed in this bill.

The absurdity of this contention is shown by the fact that under the Payne-Aldrich tariff, including the corporation tax it carried and ordinary receipts from internal revenue and all other sources, the largest amount of revenue collected in any fiscal year during the life of that act, excluding postal receipts, was only $724,111,000 for the fiscal year 1913, which amount was about $10,000,000 less than similar receipts, exclusive of postal receipts, during the first year of the operation of the present tariff act and before the emergency taxes were levied.

The average ordinary receipts of the Government, exclusive of postal receipts, during the four years, taking them all, of the Payne-Aldrich bill were only $698,196,446.

During the Payne-Aldrich bill more than half of our dutiable imports came from Europe. There was then no embargo upon these importations other than that imposed by the high rates of that bill. As a result of the war conditions, practically shutting out importations from the great manufacturing nations of Germany, Belgium, and Austria, our imports from Europe are today only about five-eighths of normal, while our imports of the highly dutiable goods have fallen off in still larger proportion.

It is apparent if in these conditions we had the Payne-Aldrich law, even if the normal expenditures of the Government were much less than they are, it would be necessary in order to raise the nearly $400,000,000 for preparedness and the Mexican situation to levy greater additional taxes than are now proposed and than are now necessary to be raised.

It is obvious that any system of finance that depends upon customs duties for revenue would not meet the abnormal conditions of the present European war. Any such system would completely break down when subjected to the present abnormal conditions, and necessarily would yield a very inadequate revenue.

Now, Mr. President, I think I have shown, and shown conclusively, that but for the preparedness and Mexican expenses our present revenue laws would take care of the normal expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year, even with the termination of the emergency provision of the present law December 31, 1916, and that the taxes imposed in the pending bill and the bond issue contemplated are necessary only to meet the increase in our expenses due to appropriations made on account of preparedness and the Mexican situation.

In passing it may be well, in connection with the Republican suggestion as to the sufficiency of the Payne-Aldrich tariff to meet an emergency like the present, to call attention to the fact that the greatest amount of revenue the Government ever received from the tariff provisions of that act in any year was $333,600,000, and that the average annual receipts by the Government from that source during the life of the act was only $319,600,000—not enough by many millions of dollars to pay the appropriations made this year, with the approval of both parties, for preparedness and defense.

The annual average receipts of the Government from that source during the whole life of the act was only $319,600,000. That is all your Payne-Aldrich bill yielded in the nature of customs revenue—the highest amount in any year was $333,000,000, and the average amount was $319,600,000—not enough by many million dollars to pay the extraordinary expenses carried in the present appropriations for preparedness and the Mexican situation; yet you talk about your Payne-Aldrich bill meeting this situation!

The Payne-Aldrich Act was not, so far as the Government was concerned, a great producer of customs revenue, although it was a great source of revenue to the beneficiaries of the protection it afforded.

The complaint against the Payne-Aldrich Act, on the part of the people, was not on account of the amount they had to pay into the Treasury, but on account of the very much larger amount it compelled them to pay to the protected industries. The people were willing to pay the dollar into the Treasury, but they objected to paying the two or three dollars into the private pockets of the highly protected industries.

It was on account of this private bounty which the people were forced under this law to pay to the beneficiaries of protection that they repudiated the party which enacted that law and that the candidate of that party, who had declared that law the best tariff law ever enacted, received in the last national election the electoral votes of only two small States.

Mr. President, I have shown, and shown conclusively, that but for preparedness and the Mexican situation our present revenue laws would take care of the normal expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year, even with the termination of the emergency provision of the present law on December 31, 1916, and that the taxes proposed to be imposed in the pending bill and the bond issue contemplated are rendered necessary only to meet the increases in our expenses which are due, as I have stated, to appropriations made on account of preparedness and the Mexican situation.

The question is, How shall we raise the additional money needed for this purpose? How shall we provide for the payment of these appropriations that have been made with the approval and support of both parties and, it is believed, of an overwhelming majority of the people of the country? We propose in this bill to raise this money chiefly by increasing taxes upon incomes, both of individuals and corporations, and by levying a tax upon inheritances, graduating it so that it will be heavier upon larger than smaller estates, and from the profits arising from the manufacture of munitions of war in this country and the materials entering into their production.

There is no reason why the income tax should not be increased to help defray this increase. It is a tax upon wealth, so is the tax upon inheritances a tax upon wealth.

Under our old system of taxation practically the whole revenues of the Government were raised by taxes upon consumption, a tax in the main which was paid by the people and but very little by wealth. The purpose of amending the Constitution so as to allow incomes to be taxed was to remedy this inequality, that wealth might be required to pay its just part of these burdens.

The reasons why munitions have been selected for taxation is apparent to everyone. I do not think the justice of imposing this tax under the circumstances can be seriously questioned. While there has been a general advance in prices on account of the war, the price of munitions and the things which enter into their manufacture have advanced out of all proportion to the normal advance. These enormous profits have been made directly as a result of the war, and there would seem to be no reason why the recipients of these extraordinary profits should not contribute toward the payment of the additional expenses which have devolved upon the Government in the emergency out of which their profits have come.

I need not take the time of the Senate to discuss at this time dyestuffs, unfair competition, and the tariff commission provisions of the bill. They will be thoroughly discussed, I assume, in the general debate, and when these sections are reached for amendment.

Mr. President, I have covered the points I have set out to discuss, and for the present I content myself. Of course, I expect in the course of the debate to have to discuss many additional features of this subject; but I thought for the purpose of opening the discussion it was well and proper that I should confine myself to the matters which I have discussed, and should give the Senate the benefit of any information which I have derived from the rather thorough investigation which I have made into the financial conditions making it necessary to have additional revenues to meet the requirements incident to the large expenditures involved in the preparedness program upon which we have entered and the unexpected expenditures incident to the mobilization of the National Guard and of our troops upon the border and in Mexico.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the chairman of the committee will wait for merely one moment, I want to address an inquiry to him before he leaves the Chamber. I do not intend to-day to analyze the figures submitted by the chairman of the Finance Committee. To my mind they only spell one conclusion, and that is a growing deficit in the Treasury of the United States, a revenue measure absolutely inadequate to meet the requirements of the appropriation bills passed by the present Congress, thus bringing on the inevitable necessity of postponing preparedness and withholding the contracts for the construction of battleships and the other purposes of preparedness in the several bills. But be that as it may, as I said, I do not intend to detain the Senate with this phase of the matter to-day.

The difficulties, however, in interpreting these figures are greatly increased by the variety of statements; and I should like to ask the chairman of the committee how it comes that in the report of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives the total estimated appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, are $1,579,000,000, whereas in the report of the chairman of the Committee on Finance the estimated disbursements for 1917 are $1,126,243,000?

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania state that last amount again?

Mr. PENROSE. Shall I state the inquiry over again?

Mr. SIMMONS. As to disbursements. I did not catch the figures which the Senator gave as to disbursements.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator from Pennsylvania gave the figures as $1,126,243,000.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator from North Carolina desire me to repeat the inquiry?

Mr. SIMMONS. No. I think I understand the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to know how the Senator from North Carolina explains the discrepancy of several hundred million dollars between the statements of the House chairman and the Senate chairman?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know that I understand the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, I will go over it again.

Mr. SIMMONS. What was the amount the Senator gave as the total appropriations?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I hold in my hand the report of Mr. KITCHIN, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted to the House of Representatives on July 5, 1916, and I quote from that report on page 2, as follows:

> Total estimated appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, $1,579,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. They will be more than that.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Utah suggests that they will be more than that, but I am not arguing that question now. Then, I take the report of the chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, and I quote from page 2 of his report, as follows:

> Estimated disbursements for 1917, $1,126,243,000.

I naturally ask the question how there could occur a discrepancy of over $400,000,000 between the two estimates?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not understand that there is any such discrepancy. The estimate of total appropriations, as given by me a few moments ago in the beginning of my remarks, was $1,572,000,000. There seems to be a difference between those figures and the figures the Senator read from the House report of $7,000,000 only.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, how does the Senator reconcile the discrepancy between the estimate of Mr. KITCHIN, as found in the report of the House committee on page 2, and the estimate of the Senate Committee on Finance? Let the Senator read his own report.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is doing a very strange thing. He is comparing estimated disbursements with appropriations.

Mr. PENROSE. That is just what I want to get out of the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I will make it clear to him if he does not understand the statement I made. I stated in the beginning of my remarks that the appropriations—not the estimated appropriation, but the appropriations actually made—including those contained in the Army and Navy appropriation bills and the general deficiency bill, which have not yet been signed by the President, amounted to $1,572,000,000. I stated that it was usual, in order to estimate the ordinary disbursements for the year, to deduct from that sum the appropriations for the Post Office Department on account of postal expenditures.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; that is right.

Mr. SIMMONS. And it is also usual for the purpose of ascertaining the estimated disbursements to deduct about 5 per cent as the amount of the appropriations that will not be expended.

Mr. PENROSE. We understand that; yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. That made the sum of $445,765,000, which, subtracted from the total appropriations, leaves the amount which it is estimated will be disbursed during the fiscal year for all purposes, except for the Post Office Department and the sinking fund.

Mr. PENROSE. Now I am getting the information that I wanted to get from the Senator when I addressed an inquiry to him during his statement, as to whether the Secretary of the Treasury had sent an itemized statement. The Senator's reply, as I understood, was that he had no such itemized statement. I refer to the statement of August 17, 1916.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Senator is mistaken. I said that the department had sent me a memorandum. They merely sent me a general statement as to the appropriations; they merely gave me a general statement as to estimated expenditures. I then asked them for a specific statement with reference to preparedness expenditures, and they gave me that specific statement, which I gave to the Senate in my remarks.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator have any objection, as chairman of the committee, to writing to the Secretary of the Treasury asking for an itemized statement?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to doing that, except for the fact that the Senator, who is the ranking member of the minority on the Finance Committee, has the same authority to do that as I have, and he will get the same frank response that I would get.

Mr. PENROSE. I will be glad to do that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the estimate of the amount of appropriations as given by the Senator from North Carolina was $1,572,000,000, which falls far short of what the appropriations will be. The appropriations made at this session of Congress will be nearer $1,700,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, well, the Senator——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want the Senate to take the word of the Senator from North Carolina for it, nor do I want it to take the word of the Senator from Pennsylvania or my word for it; I want the Senate to take the actual appropriation bills which have been passed at this session of Congress.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, what did the Senator say the amount would be?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Iowa asks what the appropriations actually will amount to. I will say to the Senator that I am waiting now for the general deficiency bill to be passed, as it is expected it will be passed by the House within a very few days, and as soon as that bill passes the Senate I will call attention to the facts and give the exact appropriations to a cent. I say to the Senator from North Carolina now that they will be nearly $1,700,000,000. In that connection I will also say——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator will remember that I said in my remarks that I did not include, and the department did not include, in the estimate of $1,572,000,000 the $20,000,000 for the nitrate plant and the $50,000,000 for the shipping bill.

If the Senator will pardon me one moment further, the Senator's colleagues on the committee and himself in their report on the present bill state just about what the Senator has stated now, that the appropriations will amount to approximately $1,700,000,000. If the Senator will deduct $50,000,000 for the shipping bill, $20,000,000 for the nitrate plant, and $9,000,000 on account of the rural-credits act, which has been included as an appropriation, but is not an appropriation, and will also deduct the $47,000,000 which the House and the Senate conferees struck out of the Army appropriation bill, he will find that there should be deducted from his estimate $126,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. Deducting that from his estimate of $1,700,000,000, it would leave $1,574,000,000 as the amount appropriated, instead of $1,572,000,000, the figures given by me.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator is entirely wrong. The Senator from Utah, of course, has included the $50,000,000 provided for in the ship-purchase bill; he has also included $20,000,000 for the nitrate plant; but he has not included the $47,000,000 deducted from the Army appropriation bill. If we are going to exclude the appropriation of $50,000,000 on account of the ship-purchase bill, $20,000,000 for the nitrate plant, and $11,000,000 for the armor plant, we might just as well go on and exclude all other appropriations. I will say now that, taking the Army appropriation bill, the naval appropriation bill, and the fortifications bill, the additional amount appropriated this year on account of preparedness and for the expenses of the Army upon the border will not exceed $390,000,000, the amount appropriated by the last Congress under a Republican administration for similar purposes.

I will not, however, go back that far. I will only go back to the fiscal year 1915–16, ending June 30, 1916. The appropriations for that fiscal year were $1,114,000,000, in round numbers, while this year they will be, in round numbers, $1,700,000,000. With $390,000,000 admitted as the additional sum appropriated on account of preparedness over and above the appropriations for the fiscal year 1915–16, there is nearly $200,000,000 to account for in the appropriations made by the Democratic Congress at this session. They can not get away from that.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania let me ask the Senator from Utah one more question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. PENROSE. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Utah says that the statement of estimated appropriations includes $50,000,000 on account of the shipping bill. Does the Senator contend that there has been an appropriation of $50,000,000 on account of the shipping bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, Mr. President; the shipping bill carries an appropriation of $50,000,000, to be taken care of by the issuance of bonds.

Mr. SIMMONS. But not to be paid out of the Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say so, Mr. President; and I want to say to the Senator now that I am surprised to find in the report brought in here at the last moment a statement that it will be necessary to issue $130,000,000 of bonds to take care of the running expenses of the Government. After piling these millions and hundreds of millions of dollars up and imposing special taxes upon the backs of the people, that is not enough; and now it is proposed to issue $130,000,000 of bonds to pay the running expenses of the Government.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield.

Mr. HUGHES. I merely want to ask the Senator from Utah if he has read the report on the revenue bill submitted by the Ways and Means Committee of the House?

Mr. SMOOT. I have read the House report.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator did not notice anything like that in the report of the House body, did he? With his usual fairness, the Senator states that the chairman of the committee of the Senate at the last minute brings in a recommendation for the issuance of $130,000,000 of bonds. I ask the Senator if he has read the House report?

Mr. SMOOT. In all fairness, the Senator must not charge me with saying that the House report contained that recommendation. I say that the Senate report contains it.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator said that the chairman of the Senate committee at the last moment had called the attention of the country to the fact that expenditures amounting to $130,000,000 were to be provided for by the issuance of bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator deny that?

Mr. HUGHES. I deny that the chairman of the committee did any such thing at the last moment. I asked the Senator if he had read the House report. The statement was made in the House report a month or more ago that some expenditures would have to be met and cared for by a bond issue.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the House report said that perhaps they would have to issue bonds for that purpose.

Mr. HUGHES. No; the Senator is as familiar with it as I am.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, of course I am, and I have not asked the Senator for any information upon it.

Mr. HUGHES. I know the Senator did not.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall have the absolute figures to prove every statement I shall make to the Senate in relation to the appropriations and the expenditure of the money. I am not in the habit of making any statement upon the floor of the Senate that I can not substantiate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. PENROSE. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wish to state that the figures I have given were furnished me by the Treasury Department. I made a clear statement of what they excepted out of those figures. If there is a controversy between the Senator and the Treasury Department, I can not help that. I am compelled myself to rely upon the statement of the Treasury Department as to the amount of money that has been appropriated and as to the amount of money that they estimate will be expended. I leave the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Pennsylvania to fight out that matter with the Treasury Department.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is entirely right. The figures will show, and it will be fully shown, that one billion seven or eight hundred million dollars have been appropriated in the present Congress—more money than was ever appropriated in any one year in the history of the American Government, several hundred million dollars more than in the preceding Congress, which appropriated $100,000,000 in excess of the amount appropriated by the last Congress under the administration of President Taft.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if such an amount was appropriated by any Congress during the Civil War?

Mr. PENROSE. I think not. I have been told not. I confess I have not investigated the matter accurately; but I have been told that even including the Civil War never was such an amount appropriated in any one year. The amount appropriated in the Sixty-third Congress was $100,000,000 in excess of that appropriated by any other Congress that had met in the history of the Government, or for many years; and that amount staggered the country. When the country realizes what this Congress has done, it will be simply dumbfounded.

I say, Mr. President, the present total of one billion seven to eight hundred million dollars will reach nearly two billion dollars before the end of this carnival of debauchery in lavish expenditures over former expenditures, because no account is taken of the amount of $25,000,000 for the Danish islands, the amount of $30,000,000 which the Government will probably have to refund as a result of the 5 per cent rebate allowed on importations brought over in American bottoms, and other matters which are likely to come up. So, before the fiscal year 1917 has expired, the figure will be more nearly $2,000,000,000 than any other figure. It will be shown later on in this debate, and it can not be contradicted, that taking the legitimate expenses for preparedness, subtracting the normal amount for naval and for military purposes and for fortifications, and adding up the amounts that could be legitimately charged to preparedness, it will still be found—and I think the Senator from Utah will bear me out—that they will be two or three hundred million dollars, or maybe more, in excess of the expenditures of any other Congress.

Under the circumstances, Mr. President, and after these figures have been placed in their right interpretation before this body and before the country, it will become evident that this revenue bill, which is expected to bring in some $200,000,000, will absolutely fail to meet even the requirements for the ill-advised and certainly not urgent projects authorized by the present Congress.

It is now said, and we have advanced the novel doctrine certainly not dreamed of when the Congress voted on these measures, that these projects are to be financed by the issuing of Panama Canal bonds. Mr. President, the American people will look upon that proceeding as a most questionable one. Since the issuing of bonds under Cleveland's administration helped very largely to bring about the downfall of the Democratic Party in the country, the issuing of bonds has been viewed with abhorrence by the Democracy in the United States; and now we find the party compelled, by reason of extravagance and inefficiency, to resort to the issuing of bonds. To defray the expenses of a nitrate plant and of a shipping board and numerous other projects by the issuing of Panama Canal bonds will be, in the last analysis, equivalent to paying for them by bond issues. These bonds are lying in the Treasury unissued, as the result of the thrift and economy and wise administration of the Republican Party. Only about $130,000,000 of bonds were issued in the construction of the Panama Canal. The balance of the cost of that stupendous undertaking was paid out of current revenues; and now to advance the novel doctrine that these bonds, which represent the thrift of preceding years, shall be issued for these questionable projects, is, to my mind, a preposterous doctrine. In fact, the first act, the Spooner Act, expressly provided that Panama Canal bonds should not be issued for any other purpose than that of the construction of the canal, and the ingenious theory that they can be issued now to repay the Treasury, and then that the money can be squandered by the party now in power to finance doubtful projects and to make good a deficit, will not alter the fact that such a deficit exists. No amount of ingenious reasoning on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Finance will alter the fact that outside of preparedness there has been at least $200,000,000 of wasteful appropriations and expenditures in the present Congress. That condition of the Treasury will absolutely necessitate the withholding of contracts for battleships and delay the whole scheme of preparedness. The figures of the Secretary of the Treasury may be juggled as they may, but when the Secretary of the Treasury is up against the brute fact of not having money to pay for these projects he will then find that figures will not make a surplus in the Treasury.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss this bill at any great length this afternoon, but I want to call attention to one feature of it which seems to me worthy of referring to briefly, and I do it good-humoredly—that is the peculiar history of this measure.

We are called upon to consider a revenue bill of extraordinary importance, introducing novel methods of taxation, so far as all precedents in American history are concerned; and this extraordinary measure has been delayed until midsummer and has been before the Congress and been before the American people but a short time. The Senate of the United States and the minority are called upon to consider this bill, to amend it, if may be, or try to amend it, in the brief period of a week and a few days which remain for the present session of Congress. This revenue measure was introduced in the House of Representatives on July 1. It must have been evident to the Democratic leaders in the House and to the administration that additional revenues would be necessary, and yet no meeting of the Ways and Means Committee was held, no public discussion was had of the methods of raising revenue; nothing whatever was done until the beginning of the fiscal year 1917, when this measure was introduced in the House on July 1, 1916. It was reported to the House on July 5 and passed on July 10. Where the bill has been during its incubation during the six months of the present session of Congress I am at a loss to imagine. I attach no importance to the rumors that many of its provisions were bandied around in New York among German chemical importers and among large contributors to the Democratic Party campaign fund who were interested in some of the income-tax provisions, or among importers who were concerned in the antidumping provisions, because I know how often such reports are spread abroad, and I confess I have not taken the trouble to investigate whether there is any foundation for them or not. But we have the remarkable situation of a revenue bill not presented to the Congress or to the people of the United States until July 1, after the Congress had been in session all winter and when it was evident in the speeches in the House of Representatives and in the statements of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that a deficit of at least two or three hundred million dollars was facing this Government. Why this delay occurred I am at a loss to understand.

What has become of the "pitiless publicity" which we read about during the campaign in 1912, when the present administration was placed in power?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. STONE. The Senator was wondering why the revenue bill had not been introduced earlier than it was in the House.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. STONE. I remind the Senator that the Congress, responding to the popular demand or what seemed to be the popular demand, urged on by the Senator from Pennsylvania among others, was facing a situation, or a likely situation, that would require very much larger appropriations than usual, than what might be called normal appropriations; and until the congressional policy was developed and disclosed, and until the demands that would come upon the Treasury were better known, I submit to the Senator that the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate were almost compelled to delay action to see what the demand upon the Treasury would be.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, perhaps there is something in the contention of the Senator from Missouri, in view of the vacillation and change of front of the Wilson administration upon the question of national defense. In the beginning of his administration the President was "too proud to fight," and later on, toward the middle of it, he seemed to be getting ready to fight anybody. However, there seems to have been a defined issue in favor of preparedness early last winter; and why this bill should have been left until as late as July 1 before its introduction is to me incomprehensible, unless it is a result of that dilatory method of transacting legislative business to which I intend to refer later on in this debate.

But be that as it may, the bill was introduced on July 1, and reported to the House on July 5, four days being given to the minority Members of the Ways and Means Committee and of the House of Representatives to consider the bill. I quote from Mr. FORDNEY in the House of Representatives. In speaking on this measure, he says:

> I received a copy of this bill, I think, on Saturday last, the first real evidence I had of what was going into the bill. On Monday night, at half past 10 o'clock, I received by special messenger a copy of the report on that bill as prepared by our Democratic friends, and I want to read to you just one brief statement in that report, to show you what it has to say and what part Republicans had in its make-up. Remember, I received this report Monday night at half past 10 o'clock. It reads as follows:
> "The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House without amendment."
>
> [Laughter.]
>
> I received that on Monday night, and on Tuesday morning I received a postal card stating that the Ways and Means Committee would have a meeting on Wednesday morning at 10 o'clock to consider the bill.
>
> Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will not the gentleman explain that Tuesday was the 4th of July, and Monday was by common consent a holiday?
> Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; every patriotic citizen knows that Tuesday was the 4th of July, and most of the Members, Democrats and Republicans, were out orating somewhere.

Then, Mr. President, the bill passed the House of Representatives July 10, five days after its report to the House, without any real consideration or proper debate, without any opportunity to have the newspapers of the country examine its provisions, without any opportunity for public sentiment to crystallize upon this question or that question arising in the bill.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. PENROSE. I do.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator is, of course, familiar with the fact that 1 Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee and 28 Republican Members of the House of Representatives voted for the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I am fully aware of that fact, and I think they made a great mistake, and I believe very few of them would vote for the bill if they got another chance at it. They did not quite understand what they were doing. Those mistakes are made continually by legislators. Every gentleman who voted for the bill voted, in my opinion, under a misapprehension, and he has been very severely criticized, not only in his own district but throughout the country, since he cast that vote.

The bill came over on the next day to the Finance Committee, on July 11; and from that date until August 16 it disappeared in the dark mysteries of the locked room of the Democratic caucus. No intimation whatever was vouchsafed of the progress being made on the bill. Only an occasional revolt occurred such as we witnessed here this morning, when one or more Democratic Senators refused to obey the party lash. Contradictory reports appeared from day to day in the newspapers, one day apparently the majority in the caucus determining upon a schedule or upon a method of taxation, and the next day reversing themselves. While all this was going on, the Senate was called upon to sit from 10 o'clock in the morning until half past 6 in the evening to consider legislation of vast importance.

The minority Republicans were here, doing their duty by responding to the calls for a quorum, and really maintaining a quorum here, in their desire to close up this session at an early date, while the majority, who should have been here and maintained a quorum, were hidden behind locked doors acting upon this revenue bill.

Mr. President, I have stated frequently, and I do not intend to expand upon it now, that this method of legislation is really the nullification of all legislative procedure. The essence of legislation is that the doors shall be opened, that the public shall be witnesses of what we do here, that we shall keep a journal of our proceedings, and that a record of the votes of the Senators shall be had for the information of the public. But if a majority can absent themselves from the legislative Chamber, and a majority of that caucus can coerce the whole caucus to agree upon legislation, it amounts to legislation in the dark, and a control of legislation by a minority, perhaps, of the whole body.

Mr. President, the caucus has existed in the whole history of the American Republic. I shall not go into its history. It was primarily a method devised to select candidates. It arose in the American Congress in connection with the nomination for the Presidency. It spread into our State legislatures, where the legislative officers were nominated by each party and determined on; and it gradually became so hateful and obnoxious to the people that it ceased to exist in its original form and extent, and gradually became supplanted by the system of party conventions. The caucus has continued to some extent down to our own time for certain general purposes, such as agreeing upon the officials of the legislative body for whom the party shall vote, but never, Mr. President, has there been a more high-handed use of caucus methods to coerce the members of the majority upon legislation than has prevailed in the last Congress and the present one. It has been carried to such a pitch that, in my opinion, sooner or later the American people will become awakened to its evils and will repudiate the Democratic caucus, as it is now in vogue, as absolutely as they repudiated the caucus in the first part of the last century and adopted the system of party government through conventions.

Reference has been made to the fact that the Republicans hold conferences. Mr. President, I defy anyone to cite a single instance where the Republicans in the United States Senate have ever held a caucus upon matters of legislation. It is distinctly understood that the conferences of Republican Senators are meetings held for an interchange of views, and that no one is bound thereby. Seldom is there even a yea-and-nay vote taken. I do not recall any for a long time, if at all, during my service in this body. It is simply a meeting for the interchange of views, seldom held at all; and I do not recall, during my service in the Senate, any time when a measure of legislation was mentioned or even suggested at a conference of Republican Senators. They might meet to take up the question of when we should have an adjournment, or of the nomination of a President pro tempore, or of the appointment of committees, or some detail of party organization of that kind, but in no way approximating to the condition which we have had partly disclosed in the debate this morning, where it appears that there is a written rule that a two-thirds vote of all the Democratic Senators is morally binding upon the others in the caucus, so that, notwithstanding his oath of office, notwithstanding his convictions and his beliefs, a Democratic Senator is compelled to surrender his responsibility as a Senator of the United States to the iron-clad rule of a two-thirds vote in a party caucus.

In most cases the majority in this Chamber have succeeded in holding their members for nearly everything that was determined upon. Occasionally there has been an outbreak in this and in the preceding Congress; but the fact remains, Mr. President, that the public is kept in the dark. The theory of "pitiless publicity" which was painted in such beautiful colors by President Wilson when he ran for election seems to have fallen into innocuous desuetude.

But be that as it may, Mr. President, the bill was finally reported to the Senate committee on August 16; and on the same day, without explanation or discussion, it was ordered to be reported to this body, and is now under consideration by the Senate.

I thought it my duty, Mr. President, before going into the consideration of the merits of the measure to call attention to the methods by which the bill has been brought to its present stage. The Republicans can hardly be called upon under these circumstances to endeavor to amend or perfect the measure to any considerable extent. The responsibility for the extravagant and the reckless expenditures authorized by the present Congress is certainly not placed upon the Republican minority in either branch of Congress. While the necessity for more revenue is recognized, the responsibility is distinctly upon the party in power, who by their appropriations have brought about this condition to provide the ways and means.

If the Republican majority had the responsibility placed upon them, they would doubtless look upon the measure from an entirely different point of view. They would first consider what could be raised from the customhouses and then what equitable proportion ought to be taken by direct taxation after that had been exhausted.

I intend, Mr. President, to speak at length during the debate on this measure later on; but other Senators desire to address the Senate this afternoon, and I shall not proceed with my formal speech until to-morrow.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, there can be no doubt that the appropriations for the fiscal year are considerably in excess of those of the past year, and that the appropriations for that year were in excess of the previous one. The fact has been due to numerous causes, some of which are the natural growth of the country, the extension of Federal activities, and the constant expansion of bureaus and departments. Some of them, in my judgment, have been entirely unwarranted and unnecessary, in which I include the great bulk of the appropriations for so-called preparedness.

It is quite true, as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] says, that the party in power is responsible for the Government including the making of appropriations and the providing of revenue. But it is equally true, Mr. President, that the minority shares this responsibility in so far as it contributes to or acquiesces in the action of the majority.

During the past Congress and the present one occasional efforts have been made in behalf of economy, sometimes by Senators upon this and sometimes by some part of the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber. I have often had occasion to call attention to the fact, however, that these efforts have been individual and have not been supported on either side of the Chamber by any unanimity or anything that approached unanimity of action. I do not recall any of the items going to make up the general aggregate of appropriations to which there has been any partisan opposition or any combined opposition from Democrats or Republicans. I do not recall in any of the bills which are called "pork-barrel" bills any more disposition upon the part of the Republicans of this Chamber than upon the part of the Democrats of this Chamber to reduce or to economize.

I know that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] made an earnest and an honest and a hard fight against the so-called rivers and harbors bill, and that he has been equally active, although, perhaps, not so persistent, in opposing other measures designed to take money from the Treasury. But, Mr. President, these measures received constant support from Republicans as well as from Democrats, and for the obvious reason that they contained items of appropriation peculiar to the States represented here by Republican Senators. I have yet to see any instance of what may be called party opposition to the increase of appropriations made during either this or the last Congress. Indeed, I may go further and say, because the record bears me out, that the Republican Party is particeps criminis to the increasing of public expenditures and the consequent necessity for increased revenue.

Now, take the subject of preparedness. Mr. President, the appropriations made by this Congress—and which Republicans declare are inadequate—for the sole purpose of so-called preparedness aggregate a sum of money under which the imagination staggers in the attempt to comprehend it. The New York World, in its edition of August 19, published a fairly accurate statement of the appropriations for preparedness, the aggregate of which is $662,476,512.91 for the defense of the United States, as it is called, being $403,710,421.89 more than was appropriated for defense last year, the total for 1915 and 1916 being $258,766,091.02. The preparedness appropriation of the present Congress are distributed by the World as follows:

Navy, $313,384,389.24.
Army, $267,596,530.10.
Fortifications, $25,747,550.
Military Academy, $1,225,042.07.

I think, Mr. President, that is inaccurate. My recollection is that the academy appropriation is considerably larger.

Nitrate plant, $20,000,000.
Army and Navy deficiency, $34,523,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I notice among the last items mentioned $20,000,000 for a nitrate plant. I have understood, and I think correctly, that that was an agricultural proposition in the main. Although convenient to call it a matter of preparation, the main issue was agricultural. It was reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and it came from that department. It would not have been passed surely upon its merits if the Army alone had been involved.

Mr. THOMAS. I know, Mr. President, that during the discussion of the measure it was insisted that the surplus products of the proposed nitrate plant should be utilized for agricultural purposes. The bill received support because of that phase of the subject, as it also inspired opposition for the same reason, a great many contending that the bill really introduced Government action and operation in the manufacture of fertilizers and was therefore objectionable. By some it was characterized as an approach to socialism. But, Mr. President, the underlying fact is that the bill was inspired by the propaganda for preparedness. The bill was supported and championed by the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] primarily for that reason, secondarily because of the feature to which the Senator from Wyoming adverted. But without regard to the committee which reported the bill, I think I am safe in saying that it would not have been considered, certainly it would not have been successfully considered, except for the ability of its proponents to throw about it the glamor of preparedness, calling attention to the necessity of a home supply of nitrates absolutely essential to the manufacture of explosives, calling attention to the additional fact that we were dependent entirely upon Chile for this commodity, and if our relations with Chile were in anywise interrupted we might be cut off from this needed war material, and in consequence we might suffer serious disaster.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. I do not shrink personally, and I do not think my party shrinks, from the legitimate cost of preparation, and we know, of course, that the appropriations must be larger on that account; we know that funds must be raised accordingly. But I think we ought to be generous enough to give other departments credit for what they have secured benefits in.

The matter of this nitrate plant arose entirely in the Agricultural Department, and the Agricultural Committee had exhaustive hearings. Of course, it was convenient to use its availability in war measures, but it is purely agricultural. The main thing was to so hide the real purpose that the Government could sell and not directly and openly outrage the Constitution by entering into trade and commerce as such. So it was largely loaded on the Military Establishment and held there for that purpose, with the possibility (?) that we would sell the overplus, and so forth; but, as a matter of fact, it was proposed, and doubtless would have been carried out, with the strength behind it, if there had not been any such thing as preparedness, because it was insisted that it was needed in agriculture, especially in the cotton fields.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator knows, of course, that while the bill for the establishment of a nitrate plant was reported from the Agricultural Committee, it was incorporated into the bill for national defense.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; for the reason——

Mr. THOMAS. And it was in that bill, and as a consequence it is legitimate to characterize it as one of the appropriations made for that purpose.

Mr. WARREN. For the World in its editorial, yes; but for the Senator and myself, who were here, it is only fair to admit, as he has done, and as I have asserted, that while it was helped in that way, and while the Military Establishment was used to carry the appropriation, it was nevertheless an agricultural measure, and its purpose was to conduce to agriculture first and foremost.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have admitted, as of course I must admit, the agricultural feature of that appropriation. For the purpose for which I rose I do not know that it is particularly important. I mention these appropriations, however, as being among those which receive, I will not say the unanimous, but the overwhelming support of the Republican Members of the United States Senate; and that party in its platform indicates quite clearly that it is not even satisfied with this vast amount of money designed for the purposes to which I have called attention, and which, in my judgment, is two-thirds larger than there was any necessity for, two-thirds larger than it would have been but for the fact that the country is in a state of hysteria created by the tremendous conflict across the seas, and by the appeals that have been made to the American people, through which their fears have been aroused, in consequence of which they have been forced over the so-called precipice of preparation.

I want to say here and now, although I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, we are only upon the threshold of appropriations for so-called preparedness. This country has taken the plunge, and from now on we shall have as large a Navy as any country in the world, while the accretions of our Army will continue until it also shall be able to measure strength with those of the empires of Europe. We have changed our policy and will become more or less a military people.

What I regret is that the Democratic Party while in power has taken the initial step in this new policy, and it is not surprising that it has not only taken the step but that the opponents of that party are now holding it responsible for its efforts to raise a part of the revenue necessary to meet these expenses. The Republican convention at Chicago said:

We must have a Navy strong and so well proportioned and equipped, so thoroughly ready and prepared, that no enemy can gain command of the sea and effect a landing in force on either our western or eastern coast. To secure these results we must have a coherent and continuous policy of national defense, which even in these perilous days the Democratic Party has utterly failed to develop, but which we promise to give to the country.

If for some punishment of our national sins our destiny should again pass under the supremacy of the Republican Party, we will find the Senator from Pennsylvania defending appropriations made by the Congress of the United States compared with which the hundreds of millions which now seem so appalling to him will be almost as nothing.

Mr. President, I have said that two or three Members of the Senate on the Republican side have fought for economy, and two or three only. Unfortunately, the Senator from Pennsylvania was not one of them. If during the passage of the laws creating appropriations, except when we discussed the naval bill, which threatened the armor-plate factories of the Senator's State, he was present here to oppose any of the appropriations which he now denounces, I am not aware of the fact.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. THOMAS. The fight was made by two or three other Senators upon that side of the Chamber, who did not have when they needed it the powerful support of the Senator from Pennsylvania, but who now so severely denounces the Democratic Party for its extravagance.

I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the Senator will discover that I was paired during my absence. I had felt that I could not do much to stem this tide, but I want to assure the Senator that had I ever dreamed of the extent to which the party in power would have gone my return would have been much earlier than it was. It has been done only recently, and I have been astounded to witness the condition in which the majority have gotten the Government.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it is said that deathbed repentance is better than no repentance at all, and I am glad that the Senator finally learned during his absence that the Treasury of this country had been imperiled by Democratic extravagance and inefficiency, and that he hastened therefore to resume his place among us and give us the benefit of his cheerful presence and his wiser counsel.

But, Mr. President, I am afraid, and I shall refer to that subject later, that we may not have the Senator with us much longer than this session shall last. I have had, as a matter of curiosity, an examination made of the RECORD for the purpose of determining the extent of the Senator's presence and absence since the Democratic Party has been in power. Of course, I am aware that the Senator is paired; I could not be otherwise, because in about 75 per cent of the roll calls his pair announced the fact that he was paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania and therefore withheld his vote because of that Senator's absence.

Mr. President, the Senate convened in the Sixty-third Congress immediately after the inauguration and held four sessions, at each of which the Senator was present. We then had a special session, which convened in April and lasted until some time in November. The Senator was present 49 times and absent 62 times when the roll was called.

At the second session of the Sixty-third Congress, which began the first Monday of December and continued into the month of October, 1914, the Senator answered at 18 and was absent at 494 roll calls in a total of 512.

At the third session he did a little better. He was present at 29 and absent at 95 roll calls. In the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress, up to and including August 10, 1916, he was present 44 times and absent 214 times out of a total of 258.

The RECORD upon the yeas and nays I will not read, but it shows a similar discrepancy. I have here the percentage of answers upon roll calls and also upon yeas and nays, which I ask to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the request will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. THOMAS. Now, the Senator has been very regular in his attendance during the past month or so. It is a surprising fact. I think the fact is accounted for by a description probably based upon facts, although, of course, colored somewhat when described by the facile pen of Mr. Blythe, that it is due in part to the reception which the Senator and some of his immediate political associates received at the hands of their new-found presidential candidate some time last June. Mr. Blythe in the Saturday Evening Post gives a very amusing description of that reception, which he calls "The agony of strong men," and I will read it with the permission of the Senate:

THE AGONY OF STRONG MEN.

It was approximately high noon on June 10 when the Republicans nominated Mr. Hughes and announced they would begin an active campaign immediately. The Republican idea of an active campaign, for the space of 30 days, so far as could be discerned, consisted in the appointment of Mr. Willcox as chairman and the entertainment of Col. Roosevelt at luncheon by Mr. Hughes, the one function being about as exciting as the other, but both well calculated to have their effect on the needed Progressives; for Mr. Willcox is a nice, amiable, subdued person, who had no part in the foul crime of preventing the nomination of Mr. Roosevelt by the Republicans in 1912; and it was plainly apparent that Mr. Hughes did not have poison put in Mr. Roosevelt's soup. The colonel came away in his usual buoyant health, which showed that these two strong men stood again shoulder to shoulder in the great work of keeping their ideals herded in one place.

This was what we learned for 30 days, this and the important facts that Mr. Hughes allowed two men to sit in his drawing-room on a train and smoke; that he likes apple pie; and that the Democratic story that he trims his own beard is a canard. But it was not what we might have learned had there been full access to the interior proceedings. Oh, it is a sad, sad story, mates, the tearful tale of the agony of strong men, the slaughter of ambitions, the sobs of BOIES PENROSE—could anything be sadder than the sobs of BOIES PENROSE? The answer is, "Nothing could be."

I might digress by saying that nothing perhaps could be sadder except it be the Senator's appeal for economy here.

Picture to yourselves, if you care to, that eager and enthusiastic little company of Old Guardsters hurrying from Chicago to congratulate the candidate, confer with him, and do a modicum of innocent conniving on the side. They were in high and happy spirits, a merry little party, consisting of Murray Crane, who softly hummed to himself those immortal lines about the fierce ingratitude of forgetting auld acquaintance; BOIES PENROSE, who joined his deep and resonant bass with the murmuring tenor of Mr. Crane; REED SMOOT, who as befits his apostolic position smiled sedately; James Hemenway, all aglow with enthusiasm, Bill Barnes, blissfully letting bygones be bygones; and others all lit up with the extreme pleasure of the glad occasion.

Merrily they rolled along, rolled along, rolled along, and all was halycon.

"You see," said BOIES PENROSE, "we'll get there first, and now that we have nominated him we'll just take hold of things and run the campaign in the good old way."

"Hear! Hear!" shouted Bill Barnes. "We'll run the campaign in the good old way."

And so it went, the light-hearted committeemen joking and jesting one with another, and recounting the bountiful olden times when they put it over so expertly.

At last their journey came to an end, and entering the room where their candidate stood waiting to receive them they joyously overwhelmed him with congratulations, which he, discarding for the nonce—that's two nonces for this article—his cold and reserved and dignified judicial manner, received as joyously, and a pleasant time was had by all.

"Now, then, Mr. Hughes," said Bill Barnes, clapping the candidate heartily on the back, "let's get down to business."

"Business?" asked the candidate in a rather distant manner. "What business?"

Somewhat taken aback by the tone in which the candidate made this inquiry, Mr. Barnes endeavored to appear at ease none the less, and said familiarly: "Why, the business of running the campaign, old top. You understand what I mean, of course?"

Whereat Uncle Murray Crane and BOIES PENROSE winked in unison, a very difficult feat, for Mr. PENROSE is 6 feet 3 and Mr. Crane 3 feet 6, or some such stature, and it is almost impossible to wink in unison when there is such disparity of visional range.

Straightening himself to his full height, and stroking his carefully combed whiskers, the candidate replied: "I trust I may be believed, gentlemen, when I say to you that I positively do not understand."

There was a chill, almost a finality, in these words that sent a shudder through the assembled committeemen.

"Don't understand?" repeated REED SMOOT in his most unctuous manner.

Of course, we can in the Senate realize what that is.

"Why, Mr. President-to-be, it is very simple and regular, quite regular. We are here prepared to take the burdens of the campaign from your shoulders—conduct it for you, you know—and all at your most loyal service."

"Exactly so," whispered Murray Crane.

The candidate looked slowly round. The temperature of the room fell rapidly.

"But, gentlemen," he said, "there are the Progressives to consider."

"The Progressives," shouted Bill Barnes. "Great heavens, you are progressive enough to suit them, I dare say."

"It may be so, gentlemen; it may be so. But I fear that you are not."

It was as if 2 tons of ice had been unloaded in the room.

"We—are—not?" gasped BOIES PENROSE. "Why, Mr. Hughes, what do you mean?"

"I regret that my words have been susceptible to misinterpretation. It means that you are not progressive enough to run my campaign. It is our duty to preserve our ideals and conserve the ideals of the others. I trust I make myself clear? We must have Progressives on our committee, and men not hitherto identified with the practices that, I regret to say, have brought our grand old idealistic party somewhat into disrepute."

"But we nominated you," wailed Bill Barnes.

"I didn't ask you to," responded Mr. Hughes in his calmest and most judicial manner.

'Twas even so, and 'twas even so much more so than Mr. Hughes surmised, that the old guard were aghast. All merriment had left their hearts. Here, apparently, was a person who had the Progressive vote in mind.

WORDS HUNG WITH ICICLES.

"It must be apparent to you," said the candidate, each word having an icicle on it, "that unless we secure the return of the Progressives to the Republican Party we can not hope to win. It has appealed to me, in my consideration of this matter, that victory is the object for which we shall laudably strive. For whatever you gentlemen have done for me I am duly grateful, but I must ask you to divorce yourselves from the open conduct of my campaign, inasmuch as there would certainly be Progressive protest against you."

Well, speaking in broad and general terms, that is about the way it happened—not precisely, of course, but with enough of the high lights shown to make the picture.

Cast an eye over that executive committee, appointed at the end of the thirtieth day. The name of W. Murray Crane is not there, nor that of BOIES PENROSE, nor that of REED SMOOT, nor that of Bill Barnes. To be sure, the names of a few of the former satellites of these are there, and James Hemenway, the best politician of the lot of them, survived the smash, which proves that even in preserving ideals Mr. Charles Evans Hughes has good, workmanlike ideas as to handy preservers for the first thing; and, second, that W. Murray Crane wasn't so far in the bad books as might have been imagined.

Moreover, there you will discover the name of George W. Perkins, who ran and financed the Roosevelt campaign four years ago, who was so active at Chicago. Likewise the name of Oscar Straus, who ran for governor of New York when Mr. Roosevelt was running for President, and various and sundry other names calculated to inspire confidence in the bosoms of the Progressive brethren. It will be a stern and very set Progressive who can not find excuse for following this skillfully selected bunch of Progressives back to the old allegiance.

And it was during the course of the assault on the candidate for recognition that BOIES PENROSE sobbed. It was a sad sight, a sad, sad sight.

"Murray," he said to Mr. Crane—"Murray, can't I go on that committee?"

"No, BOIES; I am afraid not."

"Well, will you fix it so I can be appointed and decline? It breaks my heart to be thus unrecognized, and it may break my organization." Uncle Murray, being a sympathetic man, made another try. It was useless, and then those gigantic shoulders shook and that broad bosom heaved. It's a cinch that it is a sad sight to see a strong man sob. Bill Barnes didn't sob. He cussed. And even if they are now on the committee, those Progressives, headed by George W. Perkins and suggested by the Colonel, didn't have such an easy time as their Chicago maneuvers contemplated.

Mr. President, I have said that this is a grotesque description of what probably was the actual situation. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is not at the Republican headquarters. He is not welcome there. If he went there, Mr. Roosevelt would bite him; if he went there, the check book of Perkins would shut with a bang that would resound over the continent. Consequently the Senator is an exile; he is serving his sentence of banishment here. He is perforce occupying his seat in the Senate of the United States and finding fault with Democratic extravagance and Democratic expenditures. I think I have fully accounted for the fact that we have been blessed with his presence here, which illustrates the truth of the old adage that there is a silver lining to every cloud. The national Republican committee's loss is the Senate's gain. I have no doubt the Senator will remain here for that reason until we adjourn; and for the very good reason also that he has no other place to go. Of course the Senator can not remain here without being conspicuous, and what could make him so conspicuous as to denounce Democratic extravagance, which he might possibly have prevented, or at least might have opposed by being in his seat and calling the attention of the country to the fact at the time it occurred?

Mr. President, of course the Senator's sensitive nature shrinks from contact with caucus methods and caucus measures. It is a method of procedure which, I believe, he said had received popular condemnation about a century ago, and which should have remained in the oblivion to which it was then consigned, and would have remained so but for the fact that it was unearthed and resurrected by the unconscionable Democrats in order that a minority might be coerced into doing wrong. Mr. President, I have spoken upon the subject of the caucus once or twice before. I believe in it. There are, of course, possible abuses that inhere in every system; but in party organization there must be unity of action, and unity of action can be secured better by common agreement—conference, caucus, or what you please to call it—than by any other method that has ever addressed itself to my sense of what is efficient and proper.

The only difference in the world, so far as conclusions go, between the Democratic method and the Republican method is a difference of description. We call our meetings "caucuses," and we have no apology to make therefor. The Republicans call their meetings "conferences," and they are careful to distinguish between the two, if they can. Now that the Senator from Pennsylvania is back in his seat, it is highly probable that his political friends will respect his tender sensitiveness to the subject and rechristen their meetings by calling them "synods"; with that appellation they will be still less offensive to his conscience and high sense of political propriety.

When it comes to results and conclusions, what are the differences? I have yet to observe after a Republican conference is held anything but unanimity of action upon the floor. When these little meetings, which are so harmless in their nature, if we are to believe the Senator from Pennsylvania, are "pulled off," those who participate in them come in here, and, although they are not "coerced," they seem to act harmoniously and effectively, as witness the performance of yesterday. When the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] was submitted to take up the immigration bill every Republican who was present voted "yea," although I am quite sure that some of them voted against the immigration bill two years ago. It was the result, no doubt, of a conference, blessed in the eyes of the pure and the good, and not a caucus, denounced in the same circles as altogether bad.

Mr. President, I never saw any reason for drawing distinctions in names when the substance was the same, and as the substance of conferences seems to be even more effective in its results than the caucuses of the Democratic party, we may congratulate our Republican friends in securing whatever virtue there may be in a name and in securing as well benefits regarding which there can be no question, if we are to consider them from the standpoint of party. So, Mr. President, the method of our procedure and the method of Republican procedure furnish only the difference which exists between tweedledum and tweedledee, especially when you consider the rules under which we act and which have been discussed so much and so frequently that the Senate and the country are as familiar with them as are the members of the caucus itself.

Another thing which seems to give offense to our friends upon the other side, who denounce it chronically and roundly and vehemently, is the interference, as they call it, of the President of the United States with the legislation of the country.

Mr. President, it is true that Woodrow Wilson has impressed his views and his ideas of legislation upon the statute books of the Nation and has cooperated, and cooperated heartily, with his party in efforts to secure needed legislation. Before his nomination, before his name was ever mentioned for the Presidency of the United States, he announced in one of his publications what his views of the Presidency with regard to that subject were, and he has consistently followed them, followed them successfully, and has thereby established his right to leadership. Because of that fact he is to-day the strongest, the most popular, and the most powerful of living statesmen the world over. His methods seem objectionable to our friends upon the other side. They would prefer such a President as the late Senator Dolliver, of Iowa, described—"a large, good-natured man, surrounded by a coterie of gentlemen who know precisely what they want."

Mr. President, if my memory serves me aright, the predecessor of that good-natured gentleman was himself something of a leader, something of a driver. He may not have come to the Capitol, but he impressed his views upon the party majority, and they never failed to obey him.

I have never been a follower of Mr. Roosevelt, but I have always admired him as a leader, a dominant master of men. When he was President he was President, indeed. I have no doubt that many Senators of his party feared and hated him while they obeyed him, and obeyed him faithfully. His hold upon the American public is due to the existence and exercise of those dominating qualities which characterize Woodrow Wilson.

Strange it is that the Republican presidential nominee is charging Mr. Wilson with being inept and vacillating, while Republican Senators declare that his will is so powerful and his domination so great that he has usurped the province of legislation and requires the enactment of statutes when and where he thinks will be best for the country—a man evidently of contradictory attributes, vacillating in some directions for political purposes and dominating in others for the same purposes.

If there be any strength at all to Mr. Hughes as a public man, it lies in his domination of his party when he was governor of the State of New York. He then impressed his views upon legislation. He was denounced for usurping the province of a coordinate branch of the Government. He took the people into his confidence, and by visiting and talking to constituencies forced the action of the New York Legislature upon all important matters.

Should he be elected, if he amounts to anything as a President, he will do precisely what he did as governor; precisely what Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Wilson have done as Presidents. Otherwise, although not large and round, he will be a good natured man, surrounded by the same gentlemen who will know precisely what they want.

Mr. President, we have no apologies to make for our President. We are quite content to follow his leadership, for he always leads to the right and always leads to victory.

Mr. President, I propose later to have something further to say while this bill is under consideration with reference to some of its features; and I think that, notwithstanding the objections urged and to be urged by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, we shall manage to present the country with a fairly good bill for the purpose of meeting some of the increases in our appropriations, for which the vote of the complaining Senators upon the other side together with our own were cast, and for which they are alike responsible.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I was very much interested and very much amused when the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], in answer to some of the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], asked that Senator if he was not aware that some 28 Republicans in the other House had voted for the pending measure, to which the Senator from Pennsylvania responded that he was aware of that, but that he questioned their good sense and their good judgment. There is no doubt about his superior sense and general good judgment; but there are some within the ranks and pale of the Republican Party that disagree even with the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania.

I have treasured up for some months an editorial that struck me as being very forceful. I will say that it is from that paper that you as a party believe in. Of course it is the New York Tribune. That paper had an editorial some few months ago, headed "The Bourbons." I will read this portion of it:

It is impossible to read the reports of the Republican gathering in Washington—

You Senators who were a party to it of course remember a gathering at Washington of the Republican leaders—

It is impossible to read the reports of the Republican gathering in Washington without a feeling that approximates contempt. In charge of this assemblage, it would seem, are the men whose very names have become odious to millions of American voters. Predominant in the discussions that are published is the spirit that provoked the revolt of 1912. Is it true, as every outward evidence would indicate, that the Republican leaders are now planning to return to power, as did the Bourbons, having learned nothing, having forgotten nothing?

Then further on, the editorial continues:

Here, it would appear, is the present Republican policy in a narrow compass: Avoid all questions of principle, make your appeal so general that German-Americans angry with the President for his modest efforts in behalf of national honor and American-Americans profoundly angered by the smallness of this same effort can cast votes together in perfect accord and without in the least irritating each other. The main, the sole thing is to win, and the winning is to bring back into party power Barnes and PENROSE and all the interesting figures whose names are a part of recent political history.

Now, mind you, this is not a Democratic effusion; it is from the Republican Bible and gospel.

* * * * * * *

If the Republican Party is now to place all principle at one side, if it is now to attempt to compromise, to collect all elements and factions by a facing-all-ways course, it is just conceivable that it may win another election, but it is morally certain that it will not endure, that it will presently be driven into outer darkness and be abandoned by a generation which is coming on the political field, desires leadership, is willing to stand for principles and for true doctrines and feels for the old Republican Party no allegiance founded on resentment or tradition.

The Republican Party can not endure as a mere catch-all of opposition to Mr. Wilson or to Democratic candidates. It can not exist merely as a mysterious agent of prosperity and exponent of the "capacity to rule." It can not endure or permanently hold power if it has nothing to offer the people of the United States but the mistakes of Mr. Wilson and the old phrases and campaign cries of 1896. It began its life as the party of moral indignation and national purpose; it will end it and end it ingloriously if it chooses now to be merely the party of material welfare and to rest its claims solely upon the mistakes of an opponent who has wholly adopted the same gospel and is seeking to steal the "full dinner pail" and the "business as usual" mottoes of the Republicans, with some measure of success.

I will ask my distinguished neighbor from Pennsylvania, the Senator from that State, to remember that this is an effusion of one of the exponents of the Republican gospel, the New York Tribune. I might have imagined the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] saying this, or the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] or myself, if I had the wit, but not a Republican paper:

In this situation could there be anything more contemptible, more provocative of indignation and wrath, than a little group of selfish politicians, already discredited by past defeat and public castigation, sitting down together solemnly in the National Capital and planning to get back to power by avoiding every semblance of courage or principle, by pandering to the passions of half a dozen mutually antipathetic factions and seeking to harness to their own cart every present popular emotion without taking firm ground or honest stand on any issue whatsoever?

There is more of the editorial than I have read, which it would be well for the Senator to read and for his party to take to heart, in order that it might not continue to make itself ridiculous. As a party you have no issue; you are just simply parading our mistakes. The public tried you, disapproved you, and condemned you. The Democratic Party is in power, and notwithstanding the loud effusions of your standard bearer in the far West, you are gaining but little headway. If you feel that you are advancing your cause by the effusions of your candidate, in God's name let him go on; but as sure as election day shall come around, the Democratic thought and the Democratic idea will be advanced and elevated and Republican policies and methods condemned in this editorial by your partisan sheet will be relegated to the background to suffer the degradation which they deserve. As sure as that day shall come the people of the United States will ratify and overwhelmingly elect President Wilson as the next President of these United States.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, as I have already said, I do not intend to detain the Senate this afternoon. I prefer to make a more elaborate statement regarding the pending revenue measure to-morrow at such time as may be convenient to the Senate and to myself. I only thought it my duty to call attention to the legislative methods which have been followed in bringing the bill to its present state before the Senate. Since, however, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has seen fit to refer again to the discussion regarding Democratic caucuses, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to a statement of the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] during the last session of Congress, in which he said:

The Democratic Party for years has been denouncing caucus rule. The secret caucus had become so odious and infamous that during all the time I have been in the Senate, until a few days ago, no Democratic Senator would admit that the Democratic Senators ever held a caucus. When we did meet, it was insitsed that we simply held conferences for the mutual exchange of views, with the object of composing differences and bringing about a common understanding. Well, Mr. President, if the party has fallen on evil days and is now willing to resort to those pernicious practices which it has condemned for years, it will not affect my conduct, because while I am in this body I shall be a Senator of the United States, responsible alone to my own State and to my own conscience. What is there in the career or antecedents of the men who would dictate our conduct that would justify or incline me to yield to their views? Are they more familiar with public questions? Are they more devoted to the public weal? Have they a vision of public needs beyond that of the rest of us? I think not. If it is necessary to reassert it, I declare that I shall never, in a matter of principle, allow a caucus or a conference or a group of men to tell me how I must vote. If it is a matter regarding the routine of party policy, not involving vital principle, I shall, of course, do what the majority of my party colleagues think proper, because in doing that I do not offend my own conscience.

I quote further from the senior Senator from New York:

Mr. President, the situation of the Democratic Party at this time may well excite the anxiety of those who love the party and have always supported its candidates and principles. The likelihood of New York State remaining in the Democratic column is doubtful, and if you would remove the last lingering hope of success let it be known to the people of that State that in a secret caucus, behind closed doors, there will be 32 Democratic Senators representing a population not greater than the population that I as a single Democrat represent, and that by the operation of caucus rule these 32, or 35, Democratic Senators can bind the representative of the State of New York hand and foot, how long do you think that the people of that State will support the Democratic Party if it allows its belief in such principles?

Mr. President, 16 States, having 2 Democratic votes each, have a voting population only equal to the voting population of New York. A two-thirds vote in the Democratic caucus is 35. The vote of New York, as I have said, represents a voting population equal to that of 16 other States, which 16 States will have a representation in the caucus of 32 votes.

In 1912 the total vote cast by Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Montana, Nevada, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia was 1,414,000, and in the same election the total vote of New York State was 1,471,695.

The Senator then proceeds to give the vote in detail, which I ask to have inserted as part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Vote in 1912.

Alabama	117,888
Arizona	23,722
Arkansas	123,859
Florida	51,891
Georgia	121,533
Louisiana	79,372
Maryland	231,978
Mississippi	64,319
Montana	79,826
Nevada	20,115
North Carolina	243,918
Oklahoma	254,389
Oregon	137,040
South Carolina	50,348
Tennessee	247,821
Virginia	136,976
Total	1,414,000
New York, whole vote 1912	1,471,695

Mr. PENROSE. The senior Senator from New York then goes on to say:

Is it fair or is it right that when the State of New York, or any other State, large or small, sends its representative to the United States Senate—his judgment of public questions is to be suppressed because there is a majority of Democratic Senators in a secret caucus who decide upon something else? Is this representative government?

When has this become Democratic doctrine, I ask? Is it believed that the Democratic Party of the country will support it? I am confident that when the time comes it will repudiate it and repudiate the self-anointed leaders who declare such a doctrine.

Mr. President, I could quote a number of similar statements made in this Congress and in the preceding Congress by Democratic Senators who have found the caucus yoke intolerable. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] was driven to express similar views in November, 1913. He said, among other things:

Mr. President, if there were to be a meeting of the Senate to-morrow, I should probably defer until that time what I shall say to-day; but as the next meeting of the Senate is to be fixed for Thursday, and as a call has already been authorized for a Democratic caucus on Wednesday, I feel it timely to say some things which otherwise might be deferred.

He goes on to recite the progress of certain legislation, and then says:

At this juncture outside influences began to be felt upon the committee. The reactionary period set in. We were told that the President could not accept the decisions reached by the majority of the committee and we were urged to retrace our steps.

I know full well the force of such an appeal, and I have no criticism for those who yield to it. Were the issue political I should yield to it on proper occasion. In my opinion, however, the banking and currency question is not political or partisan, and should not become so.

Then he goes on, Mr. President:

Personally I am already on record. I would not permit myself against my convictions to be bound by the decisions of a secret caucus on an important matter of legislation like this, not political nor partisan.

The leader on the Democratic side [Mr. KERN] proceeds to interrupt, and says:

There has been no caucus called. No caucus is contemplated, so far as I am advised. As caucus chairman I received on Saturday a request signed by a majority of the Democratic Senators, asking that there be called by me, as caucus chairman, a conference of the Democratic Senators for the purpose of talking over the situation respecting the banking and currency question and considering what ought to be done in view of present circumstances. That call has not yet been issued.

But, Mr. President, perhaps we have had enough light thrown upon the caucus methods which have prevailed in this Congress and the preceding one by the illuminating debate which occurred yesterday and this morning upon the Democratic side of this Chamber, in which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] undertook openly before the country to apply the party lash to certain Senators who were unwilling to agree to his views and those of the party caucus on a measure which is entirely nonpartisan in its nature.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Will it involve any undue exertion on the part of the Senator from Pennsylvania to raise his voice a bit, so that we may hear what he is saying?

Mr. PENROSE. I shall endeavor to do so.

So, Mr. President, I might continue to quote the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and other Senators. But, as I say, in view of the illuminating debate which we had on the subject yesterday and to-day, I will close this branch of my criticism upon the revenue bill, which does not, of course, strictly pertain to the merits of the measure, but was merely by way of preliminary, in order to serve as the basis for certain criticisms which I shall offer to-morrow, as a possible explanation of the ill-advised and incomprehensible conclusions which the House of Representatives, and to a lesser extent the Senate committee, have reached in endeavoring to supply the necessary revenues to meet a growing deficit. To-morrow I shall hope to state my views upon this matter at greater length.

I quote three excerpts from the speech of Senator VARDAMAN of February 5, 1915, in regard to the attempt of the Democratic caucus to control his vote:

To that platform I owe allegiance, and I shall not respect or recognize the right of any one man or 36 men behind closed doors, away from the searching eye of public scrutiny, under the direction, probably, of some extraneous influence, to do and utter things which many of them in their hearts may not believe or approve, to instruct me to violate that platform.

* * * * * * *

I have no fear of the withering scorn of the self-constituted censor of the secret caucus, the petulent senior Senator from Missouri; his threat of political ostracism has no terrors for me at all. I despise with all my heart and spurn with ineffable contempt the suggestion. My service to the Democratic Party in this body does not depend upon what somebody may think, say, or do. I am not a mere parasite, existing upon the patronage of power or the prestige of place. I shall live by my own convictions. I shall act the things I believe. And from the altitude of that high purpose I shall look down with pitying contempt on the unfortunate individual who would question my right to do so.

But let us go a little further. The Democrats, in the platform of 1908, had this to say:

"We believe in upbuilding the American merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury."

When was that command withdrawn? Who authorized the self-idolized leaders of the immortal thirty-six to revoke that order?

* * * * * * *

But, admitting for the sake of this discussion that the majority of my Democratic colleagues are correct, can it possibly be any worse or more of a crime for me to confer with the Republicans than for the Democratic President and his Don Quixote lieutenant, the astute senior Senator [Mr. STONE] from Missouri to plow with the heifers of the Progressive element of the Republican Party? It does not lie in the mouth of you gentlemen who have been offering to members of the Republican Party the privilege of amending the bill and going into partnership with you in its formation to criticize me or any other Senator for conferring with the Republicans to the end that we may defeat what we believe to be a measure congenitally pernicious.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I simply rise now to give notice that, if opportunity presents, on Friday, August 25, at as early an hour as convenient, I shall occupy the attention of the Senate for a short time in discussing some phases of the tariff question as related to the bill now under consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply rise at this time for the purpose of referring briefly to the rather remarkable speech that was made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] in relation to the appropriations that have been made in the past and the amounts that will be appropriated at this session of Congress, and his attempt to impress the country with the idea that there have been no extravagant appropriations made by the party in power during this session of Congress.

In the first place, I wish to say that the criticisms I shall offer on the so-called revenue bill shall never be directed against the amount of increased appropriations for what may be justly termed national preparedness. For the present I shall take the amount of the appropriations of the Army bill, the fortifications bill, the naval bill, and also the additional appropriations for national preparedness in the deficiency bills and compare them with the appropriations made in the last fiscal year; and I will say frankly that I have no criticisms to make for increased appropriations for preparedness. So whatever criticisms I offer will be upon the appropriations made for the regular expenses of the Government, and appropriations that would have been made if there had been no question of preparedness involved.

I am not going into the details of this subject to-day. I shall do that later; but so that the Senate will know that the figures I quoted in answer to the Senator from Pennsylvania were approximately correct, I wish to call attention now to the appropriations that have already been made, and to the appropriations that are yet to be made. I shall have to estimate the appropriations yet to be made, and I am going to estimate them so low that when those two bills are passed I think my figures will be under the amounts appropriated, rather than over.

The appropriation for the Army for the fiscal year 1916 was $101,974,195.87.

The appropriation carried in the fortifications bill for the same year was $6,060,216.90.

For the Navy, the same year, $149,661,864.88.

Or a total appropriation for the three of $257,696,277.65.

For the fiscal year 1917 the Army appropriation carries $267,596,530.10.

For fortifications, $25,748,050.

For the Navy, $313,300,095.84.

Or a total of $606,644,675.94.

Deducting the amount of appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 of $257,696,277.65 from the appropriations for this year shows an increased appropriation of $348,948,398.29. Added to that should be the amount that will be appropriated in the deficiency bills for preparedness. I will grant that there will be $40,000,000 or $42,000,000 additional appropriations made and to be made, which will make in round numbers for preparedness $390,000,000.

Mr. President, the appropriations for this fiscal year, estimating that the deficiencies will amount to $72,500,000, or that the general deficiency bill will carry not to exceed $20,000,000—I think it will be more than that—and estimating the amount for miscellaneous purposes at $85,000,000, which includes, of course, the $50,000,000 for the ship-purchase bill, the total appropriation bills that we know will pass will carry $1,630,383,682.64. The $25,000,000 for the Danish Islands, the $50,000,000 for the flood-control bill if passed, and other bills to which I could call the attention of the Senate, would run the amount far over $1,700,000,000.

I want to be perfectly fair in this, and Senators will notice that I have deducted every cent of increase in the Army bill, and there are items that could not be classified as for preparedness. I have left in the Navy bill the appropriations for the armor plant. I have left in the appropriation for the fertilizer plant, commonly called the nitrate plant.

So we will take the fiscal year 1916. The total appropriations for that year were $1,114,937,012.02. Deduct that amount from the $1,630,383,682.64, if no more is appropriated, and you will find that this Congress has appropriated for the regular running expenses of the Government, deducting every cent for national preparedness, nearly $150,000,000 more than any other session of Congress.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is it not a fact that a considerable number of Republicans voted for nearly all of the additional appropriations of which the Senator speaks?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, Mr. President, the appropriation bills after they reach the Senate are considered by the Appropriation Committee and reported back to the Senate, and there is not one item out of a hundred where there is a vote taken in the Senate of the United States. The Senators come in from the cloak room, and all they ask is, "What does the committee want?" And whatever the committee has decided upon they vote for.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is it not a fact that in every one of those appropriations the Republican members of the various committees joined with their Democratic colleagues in the recommendations?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I could not say that, Mr. President. I know that there have been objections made to the appropriations right along. I know that there has been opposition to them. I know that the fertilizer plant was objected to by every Republican on the committee.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Did not some Republicans vote for it on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. I can turn to the RECORD if the Senator wants to find out just how many there were.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am informed that there were a number of them.

Mr. SMOOT. Very few, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I have turned to the RECORD. In the case of the nitrogen plant there were 7 votes on this side of the Chamber in favor of it and there were 22 votes on this side against it. One Democrat voted against it and all the other Democrats voted for it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator give us the names of the Republicans who voted for it?

Mr. GALLINGER. I can get them for the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator has not them there, never mind.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was almost entirely confined to our Progressive friends on this side of the Chamber. In the case of the armor-plant proposition there were 8 Republicans who voted for it and 23 Republicans who voted against it, and all of the Democrats voted for it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator condemn the eight Republicans who voted for it, or does he impeach their judgment?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not condemning anybody or impeaching anybody. The Senator knows that.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and a very diligent and careful and hard-working Republican member of that committee. I will ask him if he himself, as a member of the committee, has had any opposition to most of these large appropriations? Of course there were some small amounts to which he objected; but did he make any opposition to the large ones?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator knows very well that I have expressed my opposition to numbers of increases that have been made in the bills.

Mr. OVERMAN. In the case of some salaries, yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator says "some salaries"; but, of course, they amount altogether to hundreds of thousands, and, in fact, millions of dollars.

Mr. OVERMAN. The whole amount to which the Senator took exception would not be a million dollars. I think the committee will bear me out in that statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to enter into a controversy with the Senator. I opposed the $50,000,000 appropriation for the ship-purchase bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not talking about that.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I know $50,000,000 is not much nowadays. [Laughter.]

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not talking about the ship-purchase bill. I am talking about the appropriations to run the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. I am talking about all the appropriations.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator's voice was not lifted in opposition anywhere except as to the ship-purchase bill. It might have been in regard to that bill; but I am talking about the appropriations to run the Government, for that is what he is talking about.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The current expenses.

Mr. OVERMAN. The current expenses. The Senator from Utah did not lift his voice except on the increase of some salaries here and there—small amounts here and there. The whole thing would not amount to a million dollars; and I do not think the other leaders of the Senate on that side of the Chamber did, either. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is a very faithful and able member of the Appropriations Committee. We have all worked together in the interest of the Government, I think. There is no partisanship in that committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in rising I did not even intend to go into these figures to-day, and would not have done so, as I said, unless it had been necessary in answer to a question that was asked by the Senator from Pennsylvania; but I had thought that I would submit this afternoon a few remarks upon the question of extravagance in general.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCLEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is one statement the Senator made that is not entirely clear to me, and about which I wish to ask him.

The Senator has said that the appropriations in the naval bill amounted to $313,000,000. I speak in round numbers. I take it for granted that he does not include as an appropriation the authority which we have given the Secretary of the Navy or the President to enter into contracts for the construction of a great many ships. Suppose that all those ships were brought into the aggregate of the appropriation, what would the naval bill amount to in that event?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not figured that up, Mr. President; and I could not, I suppose, if I should undertake to do it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would add just $50,000,000 more; that is all.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, it would be more than that. The Senator means as to the contracts for the building of the complete Navy program.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, he means during the three years?

Mr. CUMMINS. We have incurred certain obligations, or may incur them at any day. We have authorized the President to enter into contracts for the building of 157, I think, or 167, new ships.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not in mind just how much they may cost; but I wanted it to be perfectly clear that the excess of the $313,000,000 over the appropriations of last year is only a drop in the bucket as compared with the obligations we have really incurred in regard to the construction of ships for the Navy.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that $313,300,000 is the exact amount that has been appropriated in the bill, and covers no future contracts at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly not.

Mr. SMOOT. And of course they would be hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will pardon me, is he not mistaken? Is it not the estimate that that will cover the expenditures incident to our existing legislation which will mature in the coming fiscal year?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President, it is to take care of the battleships and the submarines and all the ships authorized to be built during the next three years.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all. My estimates and figures do not cover future contracts to carry out the program which has been adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It covers the part of the expenses incident to the program which is expected to mature between now and the 1st of next July.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The bill goes further, for two years longer, and it does not in any sense cover the contracts we make that will mature in the year following July 1, 1917, or the year following July 1, 1918.

Mr. CUMMINS. Allow me to ask the Senator from Georgia a question. We authorized immediate contracts for eight first-class battleships, which are expected to cost $20,000,000 each. This appropriation does not cover a penny for either of them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think so.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa permit me? I have the figures here to answer his question completely.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall be very glad to have that information at this time.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the contracts authorized additional to appropriations—that is what the Senator is after——

Mr. CUMMINS. That is what I want to know.

Mr. PENROSE (continuing). Are as follows—and I am glad the Senator has raised the point. I had intended referring to it in the course of my formal speech, but it is well to bring it up now:

Navy increase, $488,192,027.

Authorizations: Sundry civil bill, $1,827,000; fortifications, $14,300,000; river and harbor act, $2,724,950; flood control, $50,600,000; State aid for roads, $79,000,000, making a total of $636,643,977. Adding appropriations for 1917 of $1,710,482,722 makes a grand total of authorizations and appropriations of $2,347,127,699. That is the condition of your Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] has been good enough to yield to me. He has been waiting all day to proceed with a speech that he must make this afternoon; and I want the Senators now kindly to allow me to get through, so that the Senator from Kansas can proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have only one observation to make. The Senator surely does not want his colleague to make an absolute misstatement without permitting me to call attention to the specific item concerning which he makes the misstatement.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator refers to the flood-control appropriation, I suppose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I refer to the flood-control appropriation. The Senator stated that we had appropriated fifty-odd million dollars for it, when, as a matter of fact, we have not appropriated a cent.

Mr. PENROSE. No; I said these were authorizations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has not been even authorized.

Mr. PENROSE. Not yet.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And if the Senator is so accurate that a little matter of fifty-odd millions does not make any difference, that is about all what he said is worth.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the flood-control bill has passed the House, and I assume that it will pass Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, the Senator assumed it. The Senator was assuming to give the Senate accurate figures of appropriations and authorizations, and it turns out that he is just giving assumptions.

Mr. PENROSE. Not at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am going to confine myself now to what I rose to speak upon.

EXTRAVAGANCE OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

If it be true, as asserted by one of the chief advocates and signers of the Declaration of Independence, that we have no way to judge the future but by the past, then the American people have ample warning that if they retain the Democratic Party in control of this Government we shall suffer an era of unequaled extravagance combined with inefficiency unsurpassed.

We have the assurance that the Democratic Party intends to keep its pledges in the future in the same manner that it has kept them in the past. In its platform of 1912, that party said:

> We denounce the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people's toil. We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people.

Not content with that plain and unequivocal promise of retrenchment and economy, and fearful that the people would doubt its sincerity, the Democratic convention closed its platform with the further assurance that—

> Our pledges are made to be kept while in office as well as to be relied upon during the campaign.

If we could bring the Democratic Party into a court of justice and indict and try that party under the rules of law, the evidence that could be submitted would be more than adequate to convict it of procuring votes under false pretenses. Unfortunately, we can have no trial under the rules of law, but, which is undoubtedly better, we shall have a trial before the great tribunal of the American people, whose verdict will be given as impartially as ever was given by a jury of 12 good men and true, and we shall know on the 8th of November whether, in the opinion of the jury of juries, the Democratic Party has kept its economy pledge in office as zealously as it relied upon that pledge during the campaign.

At the close of the first regular session of the Democratic Congress it became evident that the administration had made appropriations in excess of those it declared to be "lavish" when made by Republicans. President Wilson realized the embarrassing predicament in which he and his party had involved themselves and sought to excuse the extravagance and evade censure by an adroit and somewhat plausible pretense of larger and better public service. In his annual address to Congress in December, 1914, President Wilson said:

> I assert with the greatest confidence that the people of the United States are not jealous of the amount their Government costs if they are sure that they get what they need and desire for the outlay, that the money is being spent for objects of which they approve, and that it is being applied with good business sense and management.

It is not true to say that the people are not jealous of the amount their Government costs. Governments, like individuals, should regulate their expenditures with due regard for their incomes. No man in the business world who announced that he cared not what his expenditures might be, just so he got what he wanted for his money, would remain long in the confidence of his bankers. We have made some progress in the science of finance, but we have not yet outgrown the principle that a wise man cuts his garment to suit the cloth or that it is better to go to bed supperless than to rise in debt.

A true statement would have been that the American people are not jealous of the amount their Government costs, provided there is adequate revenue properly procured, and also provided the money is wisely expended. I assert, and shall undertake to prove, that this administration has been lavish in appropriations when revenue was lacking, and that the appropriations were accompanied by inefficiency and waste.

There is no need to waste time with repetition of facts regarding the increased expenditures made by this administration as compared with the administrations under control of the Republican Party and condemned by the Democratic platform as extravagant. According to the formal statement made by the ranking Republican member of the Appropriations Committee of the House at the close of the Sixty-third Congress, the total appropriations of the first Democratic Congress were $2,231,000,000, or $177,000,000 greater than the total appropriations made by the last preceding Republican Congress. Total expenditures for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1915, exceeded receipts by $64,000,000. It is yet too early to say what will be the exact amount of the total appropriations of the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress, but the estimate is now about $1,700,000,000, which will be at the rate of $3,400,000,000 for the entire Congress, or over a billion dollars more than the last Republican Congress appropriated.

The immensity of the appropriations having been thus established, let us see whether the American people got what they wanted and whether the money was spent "with good business sense and management," to use the limitations applied by the President.

First what did the American people get in the way of national standing among the nations of the earth? What did we get in response to our earnest desire for an "America first"—for a prestige that would make every man proud to assert in every land and on every sea that he is an American citizen? In return for this increased expenditure of money we saw diplomats of long experience and demonstrated ability set aside for inexperienced and unqualified men whose only claim to recognition was that they were "deserving Democrats." We saw Russia rebuke our attempt to play petty politics with the ambassadorship to that country. We sacrificed a large degree of the respect of Pan American countries by sending to the Dominican Republic a man who was recalled at the instance of members of the Democratic Party. We demanded salutes that we never got; we demanded disavowals that were never given; we made bluffs that we dared not back. Were our expenditures for the Department of State made with what President Wilson terms "good business sense and management"?

What did we get in the way of promotion of American industry? A tariff law that increased our consumption of goods made by foreign labor in foreign countries at the same time that our own factories were closed or their production curtailed, so that millions of men were thrown out of employment until a foreign war brought relief. Was that what the American people wanted for their money? Was that good business sense?

What did we get in the way of domestic governmental service—in the Post Office Department, for instance? The Rural Mail Service was so demoralized that almost every Senator and Congressman was flooded with protests. Even the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is authority for the assertion that the injury to the Rural Mail Service in his State was so serious that if the State were not so overwhelmingly Democratic the administration would lose the State in the coming election. Service in cities has been curtailed. Star-route contractors were thrown into bankruptcy because the administration unexpectedly forced upon them enormously increased burdens without commensurate increase in compensation. Was it good business sense, good management, or even common honesty for the Government of the United States to take technical advantage of the letter of the contractor's bond and rob him of the savings of years of toil and privation? Shall we justify increased expenditures while we are taking the pound of flesh from the breasts of star-route mail carriers?

The list of wasteful and useless expenditures is too long for extended enumeration. The number of offices has been increased by 30,000, at an annual increased expense of $40,000,000. You establish nitrate plants and build armor factories, as the forerunners of other governmental competition with private enterprise, thus discouraging individual initiative. You increase expenditures in the South and increase tax collections in the North. You increase expenditures for commercial agents in South America and let the balance of trade increase against us. You tear down the structure erected by civil-service reform and yield the place of honor to the spoilsman. You maintain publicity bureaus in the Government service whose task is largely that of promoting political partisan welfare. You persecute banking institutions of recognized standing, and when the jury has brought in a verdict of acquittal you force the people to bear the expense of publishing and distributing an argument in defense of the administration. You printed twice in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and once as a public document a partisan speech made by the Secretary of the Treasury, which speech, I am informed, has been distributed in envelopes addressed by clerks paid by the people of the United States.

Do the people demand that you conduct your campaign at their expense; and if so, when and how did they express their wish? You let diplomatic and consular officers leave their posts of duty at critical times in order that they may be at home during the political campaign. You violate your pledge of simplicity and economy until one of your own number, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], felt impelled to protest against increased purchase of automobiles. Your high-salaried heads of departments and bureaus go about the country making partisan speeches while Government work is delayed. You expend your energies for the passage of a ship-purchase bill when every ship on earth is already as busy as human energy and ingenuity can make it, and when every shipyard has all the orders it can fill for two years to come. You pursue policies so carelessly considered that you are forced to reverse yourselves and acknowledge the waste of time and effort. You preach pitiless publicity, but make a record that you deem best to conceal. You pretend a desire to cooperate with business, then order postmasters to compete with banks without increased compensation, then suspend your order and let bankers linger under the uncertainty of unfair competition with the Government.

Without the advice or consent of the Senate, you send special representatives to foreign countries, with expense accounts of unknown amounts.

You are guilty of all these and a multitude of other similar wasteful and extravagant acts, and yet you attempt to justify increased expenditures by the false pretense that you are giving the people something for which they have asked, and that the money is being applied with good business sense and judgment. Your conception of what constitutes good business sense is illustrated by the record you have already made, but your ideas differ from those of the American business man, with whom you are out of touch and sympathy. If the American business man, the farmer, the mechanic, the professional man, and the wage earner conducted their affairs upon the same principles that you conduct the affairs of the Government, we would soon have a Nation of debtors and delinquents. Fortunately the American people practice economy and efficiency in their private business, and, in my judgment, they will vote for the reestablishment of such a policy in the business of their Government.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, an examination of the large expenditures of this administration as compared with those of the last Republican administration is the best evidence that can be offered as to the need of more revenue at this time, and these figures should be very interesting in view of the fact that this administration came into power under a promise of economy. In 1912 the Democratic convention condemned the Republicans for extravagance, but you will notice that the Democrats in their St. Louis convention were silent on this subject in the platform of 1916.

The last year of President Taft's administration the total of all disbursements amounted to $945,000,000, while for the year 1914, under President Wilson, they amounted to $1,045,000,000; for 1915 they amounted to $1,047,000,000; in 1916 they amounted to $1,114,000,000, and in addition to this large amount the passage of four deficiency appropriation bills at this session of Congress amounting to over $53,000,000 were required. The appropriations for 1917 exceed those of any other year in the history of the country, and the present status of the appropriations show that an amount of more than $1,600,000,000 will be expended, and this does not include appropriations for a number of large projects which will become a law in time to require additional appropriations for the year 1917.

In this connection I want to say I know the chairman of the committee has taken his figures from the Treasury Department. I also know, in view of the fact that Congress has not adjourned, it is impossible to tell how much will be appropriated. However, I ask to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a statement taken from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of appropriations made to date, with the estimates for appropriations and deficiencies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Increase 1917 over 1916, $515,446,670.62.

Mr. KENYON. I will ask the Senator if this statement shows greater appropriations during this Congress than during the Civil War?

Mr. CURTIS. I will give the figures a little later on showing that it is the largest amount ever expended in any one year. Nor does this include the general deficiency bill, which has not up to this date been reported. At this rate this session of Congress will appropriate about $1,700,000,000, to be expended by this administration for the year ending July 1, 1917.

There is another item to which I desire to call your attention, and that is that the largest sum ever expended in one year under a Republican administration was $1,295,099,289.58, and that was in 1865, the last year of the great Civil War; and here we have this Democratic administration not only asking for but receiving at the hands of this Congress more than $1,700,000,000 for the year ending July 1, 1917, and if the last year is any guide we may expect four or five deficiency appropriations before the year is up.

The great question is, How is this vast sum to be raised? We Republicans believe it should be raised by a protective tariff. We believe that the industries and products of our country should be so protected as to enable the American factory and farm to supply the wants of all our people. Those who prefer such products of other countries as can be produced in this country should be made to pay a duty upon such imported articles, and those who desire imported luxuries should be made to pay a high duty upon them. This has been the policy of the Republican Party since its organization, and it will continue to be so long as that party exists. It believes in the arrangement of all duties in such a way as to give ample protection to the American factory and farm and to American labor. It also believes in the collection of such duties as will not only protect all American industries but such as will yield ample revenue to pay the running expenses of our Government. As evidence of its success in this regard I call your attention to the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury during the years the Republican Party was in control. It is opposed to a war tax in a time of peace.

Now, what has been the record of the Democratic Party? When it was in power in 1894, 1895, 1896, and 1897 the expenses of the Government exceeded its receipts, so that the Cleveland administration was forced to issue bonds to the extent of $262,000,000 to raise money with which to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government. Need I tell you the experience under Mr. Wilson's administration? The ordinary internal revenue and customs receipts of the Government have been so small that it has been forced to resort to a "war tax" in a time of peace. Not only has this Democratic administration resorted to a "war tax" but it has also resorted to an income tax on individuals and corporations, and yet the party in power is now looking for more articles and industries to tax, and in this measure they are asking for $205,000,000 more of a war tax and threaten at the same time to issue $132,000,000 of bonds. For one, speaking as a Republican, I am opposed to a war tax in time of peace, and I am also opposed to the issue of bonds to raise money to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to ask the Senator a question for information. The Senator just mentioned the $132,000,000 of bonds that were proposed to be issued. Are those bonds exclusive of the bonds that are to be issued for the ship purchase, the $50,000,000, or the $20,000,000 for the nitrate plant, or the Panama Canal bonds?

Mr. CURTIS. I can not tell the Senator. I simply took the statement from the report of the committee.

Mr. HARDING. I do not know that I can answer the question of the Senator from Iowa, but I understand the bond issue referred to by the Senator from Kansas is exclusively for the payment of expenses incident to the troubles on the Mexican border.

Mr. CUMMINS. I so understood. Therefore we propose to issue about $200,000,000 of bonds instead of $132,000,000.

Mr. NELSON. It is clear from the statement of the Finance Committee that $132,000,000 of bonds are not to be applied to the ship-purchase project, but that that $50,000,000 are to be added to the $132,000,000 and the $20,000,000 for a nitrate plant, making over $200,000,000 of bonds.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the Senator for the interruption and also for the statement of fact.

Mr. PENROSE. The policy of "watchful waiting" will cost a bond issue of $132,000,000 and nearly $100,000,000 more if the trouble on the border continues after December, not to mention the many million dollars that have already been expended carried in deficiency bills and other measures. It will be a good deal over $200,000,000; it will be $250,000,000 before we are through.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the bill we are now considering is drawn for that purpose. I desire to print the names of the Senators who voted for the emergency or war tax in 1914 and those who voted for its extension in 1915. They are as follows:

VOTE IN 1914, YEAS 34.

Ashurst, Bankhead, Bryan, Culberson, Fletcher, Hitchcock, Hughes, James, Johnson, Kern, Lea of Tennessee, Lee of Maryland, Lewis, Martin of Virginia, Martine of New Jersey, Myers, Overman, Pomerene, Saulsbury, Shafroth, Sheppard, Shields, Shively, Simmons, Smith of Maryland, Smith of South Carolina, Stone, Swanson, Thomas, Thompson, Thornton, Walsh, West, and White.

VOTE IN 1915, YEAS 45.

Bankhead, Beckham, Broussard, Bryan, Chamberlain, Chilton, Clarke of Arkansas, Gore, Hardwick, Hitchcock, Hollis, Hughes, Husting, James, Johnson of Maine, Johnson of South Dakota, Kern, Lane, Lea of Tennessee, Lee of Maryland, Martine of New Jersey, Myers, Newlands, O'Gorman, Overman, Phelan, Pittman, Pomerene, Ransdell, Reed, Robinson, Saulsbury, Shafroth, Sheppard, Simmons, Smith of Arizona, Smith of Maryland, Stone, Swanson, Thomas, Thompson, Underwood, Vardaman, Walsh, and Williams.

There is another condition that always arises during normal times under Democratic administrations, and that is the exportation of gold. All of you remember how it was exported from this country and how it was drawn from the Treasury and hoarded in 1894, 1895, and 1896. Now, what happened under this administration? In the last six months of 1912, under President Taft's administration, the exportation of gold amounted to $13,978,000, while for the first six months of 1913, three months of the time under Mr. Wilson, the exportation of gold amounted to $63,784,616. For the year ending June 30, 1914, all under Mr. Wilson, the exportation of gold amounted to $112,038,529, and for the year ending June 30, 1915, the amount exported was $146,224,148, and of this amount $136,000,000 was exported in the last five months of 1914. This large exportation of gold did not stop until several months after the European war began and not until the large exportation of the products of our country, caused by the demands of the war, enabled our people to meet their obligations with goods in place of with gold.

There is another interesting fact which should not be forgotten by the voters and taxpayers of the country, and that is that every time we have had a Democratic administration our public debt has increased, and it has always been larger than the public debt under the former Republican administration. The last year of the Harrison administration the total debt, less cash in the Treasury, was $899,000,000; the last year of Cleveland's administration the debt amounted to $986,000,000; while the bonded debt the last year of the Harrison administration amounted to $585,000,000, and by the last year of the Cleveland administration it amounted to $847,000,000. After the Cleveland administration there was the War with Spain and the building of the Panama Canal, and yet the public debt, less cash in the Treasury, the last year of the Taft administration amounted to $1,028,000,000, while the same debt for 1915, under President Wilson, amounted to $1,090,000,000; and the bonded debt the last year of the Taft administration was $963,000,000, while last year it amounted to $969,000,000.

In this connection it is well to consider the fact that, while the present Democratic administration came into power under a promise of economy, it has been most extravagant, and this session of Congress has appropriated more money for the expenses of the Government than was ever appropriated by any previous session in the history of the country.

In this same connection it should be further remembered that Justice Hughes has gone on record as favoring the budget system and his record for governmental efficiency while governor of New York, and the fact that he appointed Mr. Williams as State comptroller and Mr. Perrine, an expert accountant, as his assistant, and these two prepared a balance sheet and an income account for the State government, is evidence that he will apply the same methods of governmental efficiency in the various departments of the Federal Government and will give the people a genuine economical and business administration. The actual cost of maintaining the Government will be known and understood, which has not been true of this Democratic administration, for instead of having one emergency deficiency measure this session of Congress has passed at least four such measures.

CAN THE TARIFF BE ELIMINATED FROM POLITICS?

A popular belief exists that the tariff can and should be taken out of politics. These good souls must have gotten the impression that there is no fundamental or irreconcilable difference between the two great parties on that issue.

If the English language has any significance whatever when applied to a Democratic tariff platform, a tariff for revenue only, it is that the tariff is for revenue and for nothing else.

Admittedly no tariff revenue can be obtained on merchandise produced within the United States. Hence a tariff for the sole purpose of raising revenue is a tariff so adjusted as to insure the importation of each article mentioned in the schedules. Certainly the importation of merchandise previously produced at home will proportionately restrict home production. Therefore a tariff for revenue only is a tariff for the single and sole purpose of having the merchandise we consume made abroad and imported. In other words, logically and irresistibly, a tariff for revenue only is a tariff for the deliberate result of closing American shops and turning American laborers into the streets.

This view is supported by words from the lips of all Democratic leaders. In discussing the bill to revise the cotton schedule reported during Mr. Taft's administration, Mr. UNDERWOOD, chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means and author of the present tariff law, distinctly stated that the committee estimated that the bill, if enacted, would result in increasing the imports of manufactured cotton $11,000,000. The duties imposed were expected to average 27 per cent. Add this duty (nearly $3,000,000) and it is evident that Mr. UNDERWOOD, together with his Democratic associates on the committee, reported a bill and the Democratic Congress passed one that they claimed would result in the consumption by the American people of practically $14,000,000 in imported manufactured cottons in lieu of a like amount of domestics previously consumed. Similar utterances in connection with other bills reported about the same time for the revision of the woolen and the metal schedules place them on record as deliberately planning to secure the consumption of more than $100,000,000 in imported manufactured cottons, woolens, and metal products in lieu of like amounts formerly produced in American mills and with American labor. If we compute these products as 75 per cent labor they stand convicted of deliberately planning to deprive American labor of $75,000,000 in wages, a very large per cent of which would go directly or indirectly to the farmer, and from the farmer through the merchant to the producer of merchandise, and thus again to labor.

What is their plan for taking the tariff out of politics? They claim this can be done by the creation of the tariff board, as provided in the pending measure, but before discussing that question it will be well to note the position taken by Democratic Senators on this question in previous Congresses.

March 4, 1911, the Senate voted on passage of tariff-board bill; yeas 56, nays 23, not voting 12. Of the 56 ayes 4 were Democrats and 52 Republicans, and of the 23 nays 2 were Republicans and 21 Democrats. (See RECORD, p. 4286, vol. 46, pt. 5, Mar. 4, 1911.) And I desire to say that of the present Democratic Members of the Senate who then voted "nay," we find the names of Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. STONE, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. TILLMAN.

July 23, 1912, the Senate voted on committee amendment to sundry civil appropriation bill for a tariff board. The ayes were 34, the nays 20, not voting 40. Of the 34 ayes 2 were Democrats and 32 Republicans, and of the 20 nays all were Democrats.

July 24, 1912, on the above amendment a vote was again had on concurring on it in the Senate. The ayes were 34 and nays 19, not voting 41, and of the 34 ayes 2 were Democrats and 32 Republicans, and the 19 nays were all Democrats.

On July 25, 1912, Senator CUMMINS offered an amendment to the wool tariff schedule bill, being the text of the tariff-commission bill which passed the Senate in 1910. On this amendment the ayes were 40 and the nays 26, not voting 28. Of the 40 ayes 4 were Democrats and 36 Republicans, and of the 26 nays 1 was Republican and 25 were Democrats.

On July 26, 1912, Senator CUMMINS offered an amendment to the excise and income tax bill to create a tariff commission. The ayes were 38 and the nays 29, not voting 27. Of the 38 ayes 1 was a Democrat and 37 were Republicans, and of the 29 nays 28 were Democrats and 1 Republican.

On September 6, 1913, Senator WORKS offered an amendment to the tariff bill for a permanent tariff commission, on which the ayes were 32 and nays 37, not voting 26. All the ayes were Republicans and all the nays were Democrats.

In considering this provision of the bill it would be well to recall what President Wilson said on the subject in the speech he delivered at Indianapolis, Ind. I quote from the President's speech:

> If by scientific treatment of the tariff they mean adjustment to the actual trade conditions of America and the world, then I am with them; and I want to call their attention, for though they voted for it they apparently have not noticed it, to the fact that the bill which creates the new trade commission does that very thing. We were at pains to see that it was put in there. That commission is authorized and empowered to inquire into and report to Congress not only upon all the conditions of trade in this country, but upon the conditions of trade, the cost of manufacture, the cost of transportation—all the things that enter into the question of the tariff—in foreign countries as well as in the United States, and into all those questions of foreign combinations which affect international trade between Europe and the United States. It has the full powers which will guide Congress in the scientific treatment of questions of international trade. Being by profession a schoolmaster, I am glad to point that out to the class of uninstructed Republicans, though I have not always taught in the primary grade.

Now, if the President was right when he made that speech, if he knew what he was talking about then, and if it were true that, as he said, "We were at pains to see that it was put in there," then I submit that there is no need for the tariff-board provisions of the pending bill. If there is in existence at this time a commission with full power to act, then why create another one of the same kind? There can be no use, unless the administration desires to make a few more appointments before election.

It will be noted that the President says, "Being by profession a schoolmaster, I am glad to point that out to the class of uninstructed Republicans, though I have not always taught in the primary grade." This is one of the great faults of the President; he has treated the Democratic majority in the House and Senate as though they belonged in the primary grade and could not get along with their legislative duties without the guidance of the master. He has also treated the people of the country as though they belonged in that grade, because he has expected them to follow him when he has changed positions on leading questions at least once every six months. But Mr. Wilson will find that the people of this country do not belong in the primary grade. He will find that they have their diplomas and can and do think and act for themselves.

In this same connection, I might say that I was surprised at what was said by the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] this morning, and I want to call attention to a plank in the Democratic platform of 1912, which shows how Democrats then considered the interference of the President in legislative matters. It is found on page 168 of this little book of platforms, and is as follows:

> We believe in the preservation and maintenance in their full strength and integrity of the three coordinate branches of the Federal Government—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial—each keeping within its own bounds and not encroaching upon the just powers of either of the others.

And yet, as I understood him, the Senator from Colorado said this morning they expected such interference.

On January 24, 1916, the President wrote Mr. KITCHIN, of the House, a letter from which I take the following. I quote from his letter:

> It might further be of great assistance to the Congress and to the public and to American industry by investigating the industrial effects of proposed or existing duties on products which compete with products of American industry; the conditions of competition between American and foreign producers, including all the essential facts surrounding the production of commodities at home and abroad; the volume of importation compared with domestic production; the nature and causes of the advantages and disadvantages of American as compared with foreign producers; and the possibility of establishing new industries or of expanding industries already in existence through scientific and practical processes in such a manner as substantially to promote the prosperity of the United States.

I suppose that when the President penned the above he had forgotten his Indianapolis speech in which he told of the powers of the trade commission, and that he had taken pains to give them power to secure the data needed for a scientific treatment of the tariff. Note, too, that in this letter he desires this commission to look into "the possibility of establishing new industries or of expanding industries already in existence."

In this same connection I wish to say that if you will read the measure you will find that there is nothing in it to encourage American industry, and you will find further than when this letter was read by the leader of the Democratic side in the House it must have displeased him, because Mr. KITCHIN, as a good free-trade Democrat, did not desire to go so far. He hastened to the White House, when out came another letter from the President, from which I desire to read two extracts:

> THE WHITE HOUSE,
> Washington, D. C., January 26, 1916.

The previous letter was written January 24.

> THE WHITE HOUSE,
> Washington, D. C., January 26, 1916.
> MY DEAR MR. KITCHIN: Our conversation yesterday made me realize that in my letter of the 24th I had not set forth, as I should have set them forth, my reasons for changing my mind on the question of creating a tariff board, for I must frankly admit that I have changed my mind since I last spoke on that subject.
>
> I have had in this change of mind no thought whatever of a change of attitude toward the so-called protection question. That is neither here nor there. * * *

His last speech upon the subject was in Indianapolis, and in that speech he said that he had taken pains to give the people a tariff board, and criticized the Republicans because the Republicans seemed to have voted for it without knowing it, and, as he claimed, he had "put one over on them."

Now, if this is his position there is no need of creating a tariff board, because if he stands for a tariff for revenue only an expert in the Treasury Department can give all the data needed.

The President is not the only prominent Democrat who takes such a position, and in this connection I desire to call your attention to the attitude of the present Democratic leader of the Senate, Mr. SIMMONS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Kansas a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is the Senator from Kansas in favor of a tariff commission or opposed to it?

Mr. CURTIS. I am in favor of a tariff commission, and have voted for a tariff commission; but I doubt the good faith of the gentlemen on the other side who every time they have had a chance to vote on the proposition of creating a tariff commission have voted against it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, as I understand, the Senator is accusing us of being converted to a good thing rather too late to suit him. Is that the Senator's position?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I am accusing you and your President of playing politics, pure and simple.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this bill contains a provision for a tariff commission. If the bill passes, that provision will go into operation, and there will be a tariff commission. That sort of playing politics amounts to doing something. Now, I do not say that a tariff commission is right or wrong; let that be as it may; but the Senator from Kansas says it is right. He therefore accuses us of playing politics by doing a right thing, a thing right in his opinion, and his only quarrel with the President is that it comes a bit late.

Mr. CURTIS. My quarrel with it is that the President says that we already had one, and that he had "put one over on the Republicans." Now he confesses that we have not, and he is trying to get the majority side to reverse their action of years, and vote for one.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the President said we had one and finally concluded that the one we had was not adequate or not sufficient, and then repented of his Democratic sins and came to the Republican position, which is the position of the Senator from Kansas, what is the quarrel of the Senator from Kansas with the President upon this particular proposition?

Mr. CURTIS. I am just trying to show the inconsistencies of the Democratic President on one subject. I would not have time in a day to show them on all subjects.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I asked the Senator what was his quarrel with the Democratic President upon this particular proposition if the Democratic President had expressed repentance or even remorse for his past sins and had agreed with the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CURTIS. I said a moment ago that my quarrel was with him because I did not believe that he was in good faith, and I do not believe he is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh! But if this bill passes with this commission in it, it must absolutely be a fait accompli—a deed performed—and therefore stands the only test of good faith that God has ever furnished to humanity.

Mr. CURTIS. What kind of a board will he appoint?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know.

Mr. CURTIS. He will put all free-trade Democrats on it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The bill requires him to appoint three Republicans; but I am rather inclined to think that whatever board he does appoint will be fallible human beings and will make a great many mistakes.

Mr. CURTIS. Probably.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But that is not the question. The Senator was willing to risk a board, and therefore was willing to risk the appointment of a board by somebody. Now, does the Senator mean to say that his real position is that he wants a tariff commission, provided it is appointed by a Republican President, but he does not want one if it is appointed by a Democratic President? If that is the Senator's real position, I can understand its frankness, though I can not understand its logic.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not want the kind this President would appoint. I will say that very frankly to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nor any other Democratic President?

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, I think there might be some——

Mr. WILLIAMS. What the Senator really wants, therefore, is a Republican tariff commission, is it not?

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator from Mississippi wants my honest and candid conviction, I would rather have a Republican tariff commission than a Democratic tariff commission.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, leaving out the Senator's preference, is it not his idea that he wants it exclusively a Republican tariff commission that can be trusted absolutely to mould the tariff in favor of high protection?

Mr. CURTIS. A nonpartisan tariff board could not be all Republicans.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But this bill provides, contrary to any bill I have ever known, that three of the commissioners shall be Republicans and three shall be Democrats. You, when in power, never gave us a bipartisan board without having a Republican majority.

Mr. CURTIS. We gave you two free-trade Democrats.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Never in your lives.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. I want to ask the Senator from Mississippi if I did not understand him to say on the floor of the Senate one day that there is no such thing as a nonpartisan board, but it must necessarily be a bipartisan board?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have said it a hundred times, and I say it now, and I might have replied to the Senator from Kansas in those words; but this is what they call a nonpartisan board, which is a bipartisan board. It is the first bipartisan board that I have known of in my long experience in Congress, in either House, which was ever composed of equal members of both parties. Let us call it "bi," rather than "non." There is no such thing as nonpartisanship in this world. I see sitting in front of me a distinguished Member of the House of Representatives [Mr. CANNON] who, if he had the privilege of speech upon this floor, would join me in that assertion.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, as I was saying, while the present Democratic tariff bill was pending a Republican Senator, Mr. MCLEAN, of Connecticut, made an inquiry of Senator SIMMONS, of North Carolina, who had charge of the bill in the Senate, which elicited this reply:

> I do not know, Mr. President, what is the difference in the cost of producing this article here and abroad. I have not investigated that. We have not been trying to balance the difference in labor cost here and abroad, because we were not trying to make a protective bill.

A further inquiry from Senator MCLEAN provoked from Senator SIMMONS a more emphatic statement of the position of the Democratic Party:

> Now, the Senator from Connecticut is talking about protection. He says, "One gives adequate protection and the other does not give adequate protection." I have stated to the Senator that we were not trying to give protection in the duties on imports here.

The Democratic contention that the bill should not protect was fully realized. It did not protect. It invited imports. In the first 10 months of the Underwood bill, extending up to the beginning of the European war, twice as many eggs, three times as much meat and dairy products, and four times as much wheat were imported as during the corresponding period of the previous year; seven times as much corn as the aggregate of the preceding 30 years, $20,000,000 more wool; and during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, $375,000,000 more in agricultural products were imported than the average of the last four years of Republican administration. Before the war orders revived industrial conditions, increased importation of manufactures had thrown more than 4,000,000 men out of employment, thereby reducing the consumptive capacity of that many families. Thus, 20,000,000 people were directly affected, the remaining 80,000,000 indirectly affected, and all adversely affected by the vicious Democratic tariff law.

Only by their votes can the laborer and the farmer avert more serious disaster which must ensue when the war ends, unless this iniquitous law is repealed by a Republican Congress, Senate, and President.

May God grant them wisdom in this hour of their need!

AN IMPORTANT ADMISSION.

President Wilson admits the present tariff law was expected to injure the laborer and the farmer.

In his message to Congress of September 14, 1914, urging what he calls "a war emergency tax," President Wilson made it clear that the very large increase in imports which the Underwood tariff bill would have certainly induced but for the war was being prevented by the war, and he asked that a new revenue measure be provided that should supply the loss in revenues resulting therefrom, which he estimated at $100,000,000. The average duty on all imports under the Underwood law was at that time nearly 15 per cent. To have raised this $100,000,000 from customs would have required, therefore, the importation of $700,000,000 additional merchandise. Add to this the average duty and we have $800,000,000 of imported merchandise which the President says he and his party intended the people of the United States should consume in lieu of an equal amount of domestic merchandise.

What would have become of our industries by this time had imported merchandise taken the place of domestic to the extent of $800,000,000 per annum? And what would have become of American workmen had they been deprived of the wages incident to the production of $800,000,000 worth of merchandise? And what would have become of the American farmers had they been deprived of the privilege of feeding these workmen? Remember that coal and other supplies, repairs and maintenance of plants, and even transportation are largely labor. The loss to labor, according to their own estimates, would have been at least $600,000,000 per annum. Truly the war, in thwarting the purposes of a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress, has been kind to American labor and American agriculture.

DIVERGENT VIEWS OF WELL-INTENTIONED MEN.

Every industrious person is a producer. One man produces labor, another employs labor and produces various products, transportation or exchange. Anyone who in any manner contributes to the sum total of our production or to the grand aggregate of our commerce is a producer.

We are all consumers. We consume necessaries, or comforts, or luxuries, or extravagances. We each have dual interests and may be appealed to from opposite angles. We like to buy what we consume as cheap as possible and to sell what we produce as high as possible.

The Democratic Party always appeals to the voter from the consumer angle and say the one thing needful to make him prosperous and happy is cheap things to consume. We appeal to him from the producer angle and tell him the one thing needful is a good price for what he produces, whether it be labor or some resultant of labor. They promise to open wide the doors of trade so that each may buy where he can buy the cheapest; for it matters not, they say, who produces, provided he gets it cheap.

We promise to compel the foreigner who seeks to bring into our market the things we produce with intent to undersell us to pay a portion of what he receives into our Treasury, to help pay the expenses of our Government to the end that the American shall have a substantial advantage in his own market. They promise the best market in the world in which to buy. We promise the best market in the world in which to sell. High-priced farm produce and cheap food are inconsistent. High wages and cheap things made by labor are incompatible. We can have either but not both. Each voter must consider which is better for him or her.

I am aware that the Democratic candidates sometimes promise the farmer high-priced wheat and the laborer cheap bread, the producer high-priced cattle and the consumer cheap meat. That is what we must expect of cheap politicians, but they can not deliver the goods.

WILL HISTORY REPEAT ITSELF?

The Napoleonic wars ended 100 years ago, and just at that time the Democratic Party enacted a new tariff law. The rate of duty collected under that tariff was 22 per cent, while the present Underwood tariff, with agricultural products free, is running at this time at less than 9 per cent—the lowest in our history. In other words, the Underwood tariff bill is twofold worse than the Democratic act of 1816, the evil effects of which are graphically told by Woodrow Wilson in the third volume of his History of the American People:

Peace changed the face of trade. English merchants poured their goods once again into the American ports, so long shut against them by embargoes and war. Manufactories had sprung up while the ports were closed. In the year 1815 close upon $50,000,000 had been invested in the manufacture of textile fabrics alone. The new movement did not stop with the establishment of cotton fabrics. The manufacture of wool and flax and hemp and even silk was added. Iron manufactures, long ago set up, but tentative and feeble hitherto, increased from hundreds of thousands to millions in value under the stimulation of foreign trade cut off. Almost everything in general use in the country was sooner or later added to the growing list.

Industry, long ago begun upon a small scale, took heart to grow, and those which Americans had hitherto not dreamed of attempting were heartily embarked upon. Distinct manufacturing regions began sensibly to develop in the Middle States and in the East, with interests and characteristics which statesmen could not afford to overlook. It was manifestly injurious to every young industry that a flood of English imports should continue to pour into the country at the open ports. The remedy was a protective tariff, such as Mr. Hamilton had wished to see at first, and the young Republican leaders of Congress did not hesitate to advocate and establish it.

Is there any reason to doubt that the American farmer and the American laborer will be as good protectionists at the polls November next as Prof. Woodrow Wilson was when a truthful historian? If they are, history will repeat itself and again Republican leaders in Congress will not hesitate to advocate and establish protection.

I desire to call your attention to a few changes made in the tariff law by this Democratic administration under the leadership of President Wilson and show the result of those changes. They will be of great interest to the farmers of this country.

Under the Republican tariff of 6 cents a pound the butter imports for the last 10 months were 1,000,000 pounds. Under the Democratic tariff of 2½ cents a pound the butter imports for the first 10 months were 7,685,000 pounds, or an increase of 688 per cent.

The Democratic tariff reduced the duty on cheese 40 per cent. The increase in importations during the first 10 months was 12,500,000 pounds.

The importations of milk under the last 10 months of the Republican tariff were $134,000. Milk was free under the Democratic tariff, and during the first 10 months of its operation the imports amounted to $1,264,000.

The Republican tariff levied a duty of 25 cents a bushel on potatoes. During the last 10 months of that tariff 314,000 bushels were imported. The Democratic tariff bill made potatoes free and also prescribed a 10-cent retaliatory duty. Under the first 10 months of its operation 3,630,000 bushels were imported.

Under the Republican tariff eggs carried a duty of 5 cents a dozen and there were small importations. Under the Democratic tariff bill they were free. During the first 10 months of the operation of the Democratic bill 6,000,000 dozen were imported and frozen eggs besides.

Horses and mules under the last 10 months of the Republican tariff were imported to the extent of $1,191,997; under the first 10 months of the Democratic tariff they were imported to the extent of $2,078,770.

Cattle during the last 10 months of the Republican tariff were imported to the extent of $5,680,733; under the first 10 months of the Democratic tariff to the extent of $16,540,435.

Sheep during the last 10 months of the Republican tariff were imported to the extent of $70,314; during the first 10 months of the Democratic tariff to the extent of $491,648.

Swine during the last 10 months of the Republican tariff were imported to the extent of $9,274; during the first 10 months of the Democratic tariff to the extent of $1,470,330.

Poultry, during the last 10 months of the Republican tariff, were imported to the extent of 588,777 pounds; under the first 10 months of the Democratic tariff to the extent of 856,859 pounds.

Corn, during the last 10 months of the Republican tariff, was imported to the extent of 139,877 bushels; during the first 10 months of the Democratic tariff to the extent of 564,699 bushels.

Oats, during the last 10 months of the Republican tariff, were imported to the extent of 38,074 bushels; during the first 10 months of the Democratic tariff to the extent of 7,600,000 bushels.

Wheat, during the last 10 months of the Republican tariff, was imported to the extent of 331,936 bushels; during the first 10 months of the Democratic tariff to the extent of 900,188 bushels.

And so I might go on with the list, Senators; but I will not detain the Senate longer this afternoon. I did not expect this afternoon to discuss the various features of this measure. I want to leave that to the members of the committee. Later on, I may have something to say in reference to various provisions in the bill.

I want to say in conclusion, that I am opposed to this war revenue in time of peace. I want to say again, that I am opposed to the issuing of bonds in time of peace to pay the ordinary running expenses of this Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there is a great deal of truth in what Lord Macaulay called "the hobnailed philosophy of the common people." That is the way in which he defined proverbs. One of the proverbs of the English-speaking race is that "consistency is the hobgoblin of small minds." As far as I have understood the Senator from Kansas, his entire speech consists of an attempt to show that Democrats and the President of the United States had been at one time in their lives inconsistent in their opinions with the opinions that they held at another time. That may be a hobgoblin to him if he chooses to fear it, but if he does he falls among small minds. I, myself, do not fear it, and therefore I do not by that token, at any rate, fall among small minds. I may by several other tokens.

Mr. President, I should hate to believe that President Wilson did not have any more sense than Prof. Wilson. I should hate to believe that Senator Williams did not have any more sense than Cadet Williams. I should hate to believe that the Senator from Kansas did not have any more sense now than when he was a lawyer in a Kansas village. That part of humanity which goes forward with the world is inconsistent. That part of it which stays idiotic is still in infancy—perhaps not the idiocy of infancy either. Perhaps that is expressing it too strongly; but in the intellectual innocency of infancy, let us say.

Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that the press gallery is entirely empty. There is not a man in it. I call attention to the fact that the other galleries contain only 5 per cent of their usual occupants. Why?

Because it went out this morning that this was a field day for a few big guns in the Republican Party to attack President Wilson. Neither the public nor the press took any interest in it, and they all retired, and they have remained retired ever since, and they are going to remain retired until that sort of foolish game ceases.

Why, Mr. President, this has been one of the most amusing spectacles in the world to everybody except me. I have been waiting here all day in charge of the income tax and estate tax on the revenue bill in order to put before the Senate and submit it for amendment, ratification, or condemnation. When I came in I had to stay all day long. It is amusing to the public, but it is tragic to me to have been held here all day in order to hear that great economist, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], in order to hear that great political purist, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and in order to hear my good friend from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] do what? Make political speeches? Am I right in that? No; I am not right; I am wrong. Two-thirds of them did not even make speeches. They read papers that they had very carefully prepared. They will go home to their constituents as speeches made on the floor in the heat of debate, and in that coruscation of intellect against intellect and that clash between opinion and opinion which constitutes debate; but, as a matter of fact, we know and the press knew beforehand and the galleries knew beforehand that they would be written addresses read carefully with some degree of emphasis to this body. And read about what?

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE of Maryland in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. I wish to ask the distinguished Senator from Mississippi if he thinks the reading of political speeches is any innovation in the Senate?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am sorry to have to answer no. I have noticed here, when men take themselves seriously—and for the most part very much more seriously than they deserve—they draw out careful manuscripts and come into the Senate and read them, and they go home to their constituents as if they were the sudden coruscations of political thought. I answer the Senator's question by saying frankly no. But I will go a bit further and say that the public business and public political morality and the progress of the Republic would be very much better subserved if there were no speeches made upon the floor except the speeches made in actual debate.

Mr. President, the dog days are upon us. They have been upon us for some time. Political speeches make the dog days harder to endure.

And what has all this talk been about? I ask you frankly, as man to man, what has it all been about? Simply the "outs" are seeking a raft to float to shore and oust the "ins."

Now, I do not mean that that is a big sin. The Senator from Ohio might ask me if that was not the normal condition of the American National Legislature; and if he had asked the question, I would have replied to him frankly yes. But I am getting a bit old, not only in service, but the least bit old in age, too, and I am getting tired of it. I am getting to the point where I want men to utter actual thoughts that they actually believe in, and not to read essays about things merely and solely and simply for political effect.

I ask the question of anybody who has heard what has occurred to-day, whether a thing has been uttered that had anything to do with the enactment and the operation of this revenue bill, and whether anything has been uttered on the Republican side which alluded in the most remote degree to any affirmative assertive policy of the Republican Party—whether one word has been uttered except carping criticism?

Mr. President, a little bit of a man, a child, or a dwarf can take a cheap telescope and can see spots upon the sun, but if he attempted to argue the sun ought therefore to go out of existence nobody hardly would listen to him unless he were enraptured with a degree of self-respecct induced by his own eloquence that made him for the moment a political partisan. This is about the size and sense of Republican senatorial attacks made to-day on President Wilson.

What is the question before this body? It is, Shall this revenue bill pass? Is it or is it not the best thing that we can do under the circumstances? Who has created the circumstances? I? No. You? No. The American people? No. The world and the world war? Yes; and the circumstances have got to be provided for by legislation in this way or some way else.

Now, there is another good old piece of "hobnailed philosophy" in that old proverb that you "can not eat your cake and keep your cake." If you eat it, you can not keep it, and if you keep it you can not eat it; and if you keep it or eat it you have got to pay for it, unless you have either stolen it or some one has given it to you.

The American Republic has no way of stealing money, and there is nobody on God's earth except the American people that can give it money. You on the other side of the Chamber know as well as I do that you pretended to be, and I believe, candidly speaking, you were even more in favor of the preparedness provision which we put upon the statute book than we were ourselves. I think that grows out of the fact that you were in the minority and we were in the majority. If we had been in a minority and you had been in a majority, we would have tried also to "out-Herod Herod" and quarrel because the appropriations were not still larger in response to a popular demand.

But, whether that be true or not, the fact remains that you were, if anything, still more in favor of having the preparedness cake than we were. Now, what are you going to do with it? Are you going to pay for it or not? You can not fool the American people. You might fool them for a short time. You might fool even a majority of them for a little bit of a time, but you can not fool even a respectable minority any great length of time, and much less for even the short time that is going to transpire between now and the election.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. In one moment. The great apostle of economy, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], with his magnificent training for partisan work, with his magnificent common sense, with his splendid education, even he can not make this apparent to the American people, to wit, that he joined in with his late antagonist and his present ally, a former President of the United States, in literally howling for preparedness and that the Democratic Party and the Democratic President are guilty of unforgivable extravagance in paying for the preparedness after it has been legislated for. Now I will yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator from Mississippi has alluded to his long experience in Congress, and it is a very honorable one I may say, and he has used the illustration of the inability to have one's cake and eat it at the same time. I want to ask the Senator if it is not his observation that under the protective revenue plan of the Republican Party the Government has always had the means with which to pay for its cake?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, under every plan of American government I have ever known the American Republic has had the means to pay its debts and to pay for its cake, but it is because the American Republic has always had the honesty to appropriate the money to follow up its projects and legislative promises and provisions.

Now, whether the method of providing the money was a tariff tax upon import duties or what is infinitely better, a tax upon incomes and upon the wealth of the country, is a side issue as far as the Senator's question and my answer are concerned. My theory is that it is better to fix a tax upon the wealth of men than to fix a tax upon their backs and their bellies. His theory is that it is better to tax their backs and their bellies provided their brains do not find out that their backs and their bellies are taxed. The import duty being an indirect tax, he trusts that their brain will not discover that their backs and bellies are taxed.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. Do I understand the Senator from Mississippi to contend that this additional burden of taxation is rendered necessary solely by the preparedness program?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no, no.

Mr. PENROSE. I so drew the conclusion from the Senator's remark.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator drew the conclusion like he assumed this morning that $56,000,000 had been appropriated for flood control. It was a mere assumption.

Mr. PENROSE. We have reached a period when throwing out such an insignificant sum as $50,000,000 is hardly worthy of notice.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon, $51,000,000 was the amount.

Mr. PENROSE. The whole $51,000,000 is an insignificant sum in view of the way millions have been thrown around this winter. Leaving that out——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think if I owed $4,000 and had to pay $456 more the sum would not be insignificant. But go ahead.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator realize that this revenue bill would have been necessary had there been no preparedness at all?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do you ask me if I do not confess that?

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator realize that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course not, and nobody else does who knows anything about it who was present in the Senate or on the floor of the House or in Washington giving attention to what was going on.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I believe the Senator is speaking the truth. I do not believe that it has yet sunk into the minds of the majority in this Chamber how they have squandered the public money without any consideration to the fact that even a Treasury as rich as is that of the United States must have a bottom to be reached. I am satisfied the Senator is only confessing his own dense ignorance of the extravagance which has been going on here this winter. The minority will show before this debate is over that the pretense that this legislation is necessary for preparedness is entirely misleading and does not in any way represent the facts or the condition of the revenue and the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I confess that to build up a man of straw and destroy him may be a sport for me or for a man of ordinary intelligence in ordinary control and leadership; but to build up a man of straw in order to destroy him, I always thought was a thing beneath the notice of a man so grave and great as the Senator from Pennsylvania. I did not say preparation for defense, or "preparedness," as the fad phrase goes, was the only reason. What I said was that you and we had made a contract for our cake; you had to pay for our cake; that you were as much parties to the contract on the other side as we were on this side; and that the greatest thing entering into the contract was the contract for preparedness, and that you were howling more for that particular cake than even we did; and that now you are declining to pay for it, or rather quarreling with us because we thought it ought to be paid for. But I did not mean to say that that was the only expenditure, nor did I say it. That was the centerpiece around the table both parties prepared. There were all sorts of other cakes, ginger cakes, tea cakes, and various other cakes, which various Senators wanted for their particular States or for their particular interest or for the particular thing behind them somewhere.

The truth is that you will never have an economical Government, effectively administered, in the United States until you have some sort of collaboration between those who make appropriations and those who pass laws requiring appropriations. But that is another question. He would be a bold man, and even the giant from Pennsylvania, who is bold in intellect and bold in defiance of public opinion as well as now and then bold in allegiance to it, is not bold enough to say—he would be a very bold man indeed, he would be a very brave man indeed, if he said the fact that we never did have that collaboration during the entire history of this Republic was the fault of either party more than of the other party.

Now, Mr. President, the answer to all this partisan rant is this: You have bought the cake; you have gone to the confectionery store, where votes are furnished. Those of you who were not sincere in all these appropriations that you have passed stand self-confessed as having voted for them in order to get the confectionery which was before you. A part of it is preparedness, a part of it is pensions, a part of it is the ordinary Army and the ordinary naval expenditures. A part of it is the $3,000,000 expended in Alaska for a railroad to serve about 12,000 white people, I believe. A part of it is the good-roads bill, I believe, which all of us passed. A part of it is reclamation for the West. For all those things that I have thus far mentioned there were perhaps even more Republican votes than Democratic votes. A part of it is the munitions plant; the ship-purchase bill; a part of it is the armor factory.

On the last three propositions you might, if you could satisfy the American people that the three objects in view were wrong, quarrel with us about the money to be expended to accomplish the objects; but your quarrel on either or all would come back on yourselves like a boomerang. The people would not agree with you.

I can not upon my feet, without manuscript to read from and the previous assistance of a secretary and experts, tell you just what other items of this money we have spent for other things; but those are a few of the things. You know that you voted for them just as fully as we did.

Now comes pay day. It is ordinary cheap politics. You go to the American people and you say, "Yes, I am in favor of a railroad in Alaska; yes, I am in favor of good roads; yes, I am in favor of an armor-plate factory; yes, I am in favor of a big Navy to furnish the first line of defense of the American people's liberty and territory; yes, I am in favor of a big Army, or, rather, a larger Army, not yet a big one—I am in favor of all these things, but these miserable Democrats are in power, and we have got to pass a revenue bill to pay for them. I do not quarrel about the things we have agreed to buy nor about the prices we agreed to pay, but about putting our hands in our pockets to pay."

What do you offer as a method to pay for them? Do you offer anything except to go back to your old system of taxing the backs and the bellies of the people? What do you offer? Do you offer anything except the idea that the poor ought to pay as much taxes as do the rich; more, indeed, in proportion to ability to pay? What do you offer as a substitute for our income tax, our corporation tax, and our munition tax, for either or all? "Gentle shepherd," answer me, what?

You remind me of your candidate, you boys. You know how to criticize; you know how to carp; you know how to deny payment on pay day; but you do not know how or what to affirm, and you do not know how to take the initiative; you do not know how to do anything. You have become a party of negation, with a great big "N" and a great big "E" and a great big "G" and a great big "A" and a great big "T-I-O-N." What do you propose? You have bought your cake. How do you propose to pay for it? What method of raising the revenue do you suggest? Some few of you suggest issuing bonds, but the last Senator who represented you swore that even the small problematical issue that might take place—and that I do not think will take place—was offensive to him. What do you propose? How do you want to get the spots off the sun? What do you propose to take the place of the sun?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield. Now, I wait confidently to hear what is proposed.

Mr. PENROSE. Of course there is no use of getting into an argument with the Senator from Mississippi about methods of raising revenue. He has stated on the floor of the Senate in some preceding Congress, as near as I recollect, that he would like to demolish every customhouse in the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, the Senator from Pennsylvania is very much mistaken. He is getting me and CHAMP CLARK mixed up. The Senator gets things mixed up all the time.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator certainly did state, when the proposition for a sugar duty was up, that he was willing to vote for free sugar even if it meant the financial and industrial destruction of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, well, I did not state that.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator stated it in those very words.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I did not state that.

Mr. PENROSE. I can find the Senator's remarks. I remember them very well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator is mistaken, and I will leave it to the RECORD.

Mr. PENROSE. It was during a colloquy which I had with the Senator in which I yielded to him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, in a colloquy with the Senator I ought, in ordinary politeness, to admit that his memory is right and mine is wrong; but in this case I can not.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator, after expressing his allegiance to Thomas Jefferson, deliberately stated that the State of Louisiana could go bankrupt, so far as he was concerned——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; none of that occurred; not even the preamble about dear old Tom Jefferson.

Mr. PENROSE. And that he was for free sugar. Now, when a Senator deliberately proposes to demolish the customhouses, looks with complacency on the destruction of a great Democratic State, throws fifty or sixty million dollars of revenue into the ocean, which had been obtained from sugar, or is willing to do it, there is little or no use for me to argue with him about what Republicans would do. He expresses an admiration for the British system of taxation, levying direct taxes and inheritance taxes on everybody. He would not think we had a perfect system of taxation in this country unless direct taxes and inheritance taxes were as grinding and oppressive as they are in Great Britain to-day in the crisis of a great war. He would think in some way our tax collectors were derelict. He has an abhorrence for the collection of revenues from sugar or from duties on other importations, because he, somehow or other, has argued himself into a frame of mind that it is a tax on consumption—a novel doctrine advanced in recent years—and the Senator will not have anything to do with that. So I will have to leave the Senator——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. Well, just hold on one second.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is not the Senator from Pennsylvania just a little bit afraid that I will forget his questions before he gets to the end?

Mr. PENROSE. I shall have to leave the Senator to his complacent frame of mind to continue to express his abhorrence of the customhouse, to reiterate his willingness to view with indifference the destruction of the great Democratic State of Louisiana, to renew his expressions of admiration for British and other foreign systems of taxation, and to reserve my proposition as to how these revenues ought to be raised until to-morrow or the next day, when I can state it deliberately and fully.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I was engaged in an intense appeal—earnest, soul harrowing—to the Republican side of the Chamber to tell me how they were going to pay for the cake. When the Senator from Pennsylvania rose, of course, I thought that he was going to speak for the party, and I thought he was going to tell me just how in detail the money was to be raised to pay for the cake—2 pennies for the tea cake, 3 pennies for the ginger cake, and 120 pennies for the centerpiece of preparedness. The country will witness, for I notice that since I have begun to speak the press gallery has filled up again to some extent [laughter], and the country will therefore notice, through the press, how "greatly the great are fallen" and how "lame and impotent is the conclusion" made of the reply by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The Senator indirectly accuses me of complacency. Why, Mr. President, you all know me, and you all know the Senator from Pennsylvania. I am frequently dissatisfied with myself, and, God knows, I ought to be; but who ever met the Senator from Pennsylvania when he was dissatisfied with himself? [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, we will go on back to the subject which was being discussed. I once had a friend in Mississippi who objected to the French word "apropos," and he turned it into English, and he called it "aproporious." Then he made another word, which he called "inaproporious." The Senator from Pennsylvania is positively and absolutely the most "inaproporious" man that ever existed—no, I will not say that—only the most "inaproporious" man that ever illustrated his characteristics upon this floor. I will say that.

The Senator accuses me of making a speech at some time in which I said I wanted to abolish every customhouse in the country. Well, there is nothing wrong about that utterance of the Senator, except that it is not founded upon history and it is not founded upon the facts—has not a leg of the record to stand on. Nothing of the sort ever occurred at any time or at any place in my career or in his.

Then, the Senator says that I said I wanted to put sugar on the free list, to "surrender Louisiana to devastation." Every Senator on this side of the Chamber knows that I fought in subcommittee and in committee and in caucus to keep a revenue duty upon sugar, the English so-called "free-trade duty," and I am prepared to defend it now as the best revenue producer imported by the American Government; and I told them at that time if they abolished it——

Mr. HARDING rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait a moment; let me get through with one gentleman before I start with another—and I told them at that time that if they totally abolished the duty on sugar they would be compelled by revenue necessities to reimpose some duty in less than two years. I was a little off in my time, but not much.

What I said upon the floor was this—the Senator from Pennsylvania has got it exactly backward—I was asked a question by some Senator as to whether I did not believe that putting sugar upon the free list would destroy the sugar industry, and my reply was, in substance, that I did not think it would destroy the beet-sugar industry, but I believed it would destroy the Louisiana cane industry, and, if the Senator's memory were as good as his partisanship is strong, he would remember that I made this argument in favor of my position——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait just a moment now.

Mr. PENROSE. I will have the RECORD here in a few moments.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not at all afraid of that. The Senator can not introduce anything from the RECORD that does not exist in the RECORD.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not want the Senator to leave until it could be obtained.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not one of the horde of Philadelphia machine voters to be frightened by fictitious language threats in that manner. [Laughter.] The Senator will remember that I made this argument at that time: I said that the Louisiana cane producers had to compete with people whose entire product—I believe the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] will remember it—could go into sugar every year, whereas the Louisiana cane producer must bury a quarter, 25 per cent, of his product in the ground every year in order to have seed cane to produce fresh cane to grind the next year, because the cane dies every year and can not be reproduced in Louisiana except by the cane itself; not from seed. In the Tropics it can be cut and recut, and it springs up afresh for years.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do remember that; but I remember another thing. The Senator denies that he said he would dispense with the customhouses of the country; but the Senator did say in a colloquy with me that he was an absolute free trader.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said that I was an ultimate free trader, and I am.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, what about that?

Mr. GALLINGER. Then the Senator would not want any customhouses if his idea were carried into effect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not only a free trader but I am not afraid of the word "free" anywhere you can put it in.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have heard the Senator say that lots of times.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am pretty much of a free thinker, in bounds of reason and revelation, and I am pretty much of a free-everything-else that you can imagine. I have never been bothered with any dread of freedom. I think that when you leave people with as little government as possible, to get along in the best manner that they can in commerce or otherwise with one another, they get along pretty well.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think likely that is so.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not rise for the purpose of making a long speech, but I am perfectly willing to be the target of every question that can be asked; and, if there are any of them that I do not know how to answer, I simply will not try to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Mississippi will permit me, I was rather surprised that the Senator from Mississippi seemed to resent the suggestion on the part of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Senator from Mississippi had suggested that he could get along without customhouses. If he could, of course——

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is not what the Senator from Pennsylvania said. I say now that I would get along without them, if I could, if that is what you want; but I frankly confess that I can not.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator ever reaches the period of "ultimate free trade," to which he has committed himself, he will not want any customhouses then.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; but I think—I fear it will be after I am dead.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so. That is all I care to say.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was 62 years old on the 30th of July, I will say to the Senator, and I imagine I would be about 104 before that time came; but still that is a vision that I have had.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, the Senator was just saying that he would be very happy at any time to defend his attitude in favor of a revenue-producing tariff on sugar. I wanted to ask him if that came under the list of "burdens upon the bellies and backs of the American people"?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; it does; but it is a tax most of which goes into the Treasury. The backs and bellies of the people are necessarily taxed to some extent in nearly every tax that is laid, but the difference between a tax laid for protection, and especially a tax laid at prohibitive rates, and a tax laid on a revenue scale, is that in the former case almost none of it goes into the Treasury as a return to the people for the burdens which they are bearing, while in the latter case nearly all of it does go into the Treasury; and the sugar tax for the most part does go into the Treasury.

Mr. HARDING. Now, may I ask one more question of the Senator?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. HARDING. I am not endeavoring to introduce a dialogue.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I understand it is merely what the English call "heckling"; but I am willing.

Mr. HARDING. I do not want the Senator to look upon it in that light.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Whatever it is, let it go at that.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator has defended the attitude of his party in changing the revenue laws of the country, and has defended it on the ground that his party has taken the burden of taxation from the backs and bellies of the American people.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish we had. I said we were trying to do it and we were aiming to do it.

Mr. HARDING. I desire to ask the Senator if he can relate to us who are interested in this question any accomplishment in the reduction in the much-complained of high cost of living in this country?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, Mr. President, if I were trying to drive an obstinate mule up a hill, and the mule did not want to go and the ground was slippery and the hill was very steep, and because of the peculiar circumstances that confronted me on that road somebody were to come along, and say, "Your mule is not going very fast; it is not making much progress; I criticize you because you are not trying to drive the mule," I would not think any answer particularly necessary.

Mr. President, there are certain natural economic laws which have their ordinary effect, but that effect is not a necessary effect, because it may be interfered with—even counteracted for a time—by other factors that enter into the sum. Every man who ever laid a protective import duty, if he did not raise the price of the foreign product thus taxed in his own market, failed of his purpose. Every man who ever laid an import duty and failed in his purpose failed in it not because the natural economic law did not work but because something else interfered with its natural operation; and every man who ever reduced a duty had in view, if he had common sense, as the natural effect of that action a reduction of the price of the foreign product in his market; and if that natural and ordinary result did not follow it was owing to the counteraction of some other factor that entered into the computation. Now, the Senator from Ohio knows as well as I do that when he lays a duty upon a foreign import coming into an American harbor he lays it for the purpose of raising the price of that article so as to give the American producer "a better chance to compete"—that is, a chance to charge a higher price—so that if he, in levying a tariff tax or increasing a tariff tax, did not accomplish the purpose which he had in view he would explain it at once by saying that it was due to something else; and if I, upon the other hand, reduce it and fail to accomplish the object I have in view I can, with equal right and undeniable correctness, assert that it must be due to something else. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio knows—the Senator from Ohio is a sincere and honest man, according to all I have heard of him—and the Senator from Ohio will not here fail to admit that he knows that in the ordinary course of transactions a reduction of duty does immediately and temporarily, if not forever, lower the price of the imported product; and the price of the imported product being once lowered, domestic competition must lower its price in order to sell its usual share of the goods on which the tax has been reduced.

So when the Senator attempts to say that the cost of living has not been reduced by the reduction of the tariff duties, he is saying something which is historically true, but he knows as well as I do that the fact that it has not been reduced has been owing to a great many other factors, and principally to the war in Europe. But it is owing to other things besides that, and in some cases to one thing and in some to another, and in some to several, but in none to the reduction of taxation levied on its way from the producer to the consumer.

Take sugar, for example: Sugar went up before we put the duty back, but everybody knew why. Prior to that time, as long as the law was in ordinary normal operation, sugar had gone down.

Now, I yield to the Senator again.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, the Senator has rather gotten away from the drift of the question I meant to direct to him. I had understood that the party now in majority had attributed the high cost of living to the existence of a protective tariff——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; in part.

Mr. HARDING. And argued that a reduction of the tariff under Democratic policies would reduce the cost of living.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And in ordinary peace times, with ordinary, normal industrial conditions, it would have done it; and it had begun to do it, and you had begun to complain of it.

Mr. HARDING. I only want to say in reply to the Senator from Mississippi, who has been very courteous, that he has raised some questions here which are very interesting to me, and with the courtesy of the Senate I will undertake the discussion of them at a little later time, and suggest what I would do, as a Republican, to raise the necessary revenues to "pay for the cake."

Before I take my seat again, Mr. President, I want to speak for myself alone and confirm what the Senator from Mississippi has said when he made the remark that the cost of preparedness is largely chargeable to this side of the Senate. I accept the charge.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, of course. I knew you would boast of that, but I doubt if you are going to boast of the bill that pays it.

Now, Mr. President, I am glad to hear that the Senator from Ohio, at any rate, is ready to tell us what they would do and just exactly how they would do it and how they would "pay for the cake." In the words of the distinguished character in The Merchant of Venice—

> A Daniel come to judgment!
> Jew * * * I thank thee * * * for * * * that word.

I have been waiting for somebody that would do that for some time, and when the Senator from Pennsylvania rose I thought he had risen for the purpose of doing it; but I was for almost the first time in my life disappointed with the lack of audacity upon the part of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi permit me to offer a resolution at this time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not right now.

Mr. PENROSE. It has some little bearing on the Senator's remarks, and I thought it might be illuminating.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not right now, because I have not much longer to speak. I am not going to have the thread of my speech broken in that way.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well, then. I will wait until the Senator gets through.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, while I am upon this subject—I shall be through in about two minutes if I am not interrupted—while upon this subject, and thinking about the Republican Party running around like Japhet in search of a wife, I found a piece of poetry which is written after the style of Walt Mason, but was written by a Senator from a very doubtful State, who showed it to me this morning in the cloakroom, and it illustrates this search for an issue which you gentlemen now, chaperoned in manuscript or otherwise by your "big guns," have been illustrating all day long. It is entitled "Hughes at the crossroads." It may not be verse, but it might be "werse." It may be doggerel; but if so, rhymed doggerel is a very good answer to prosaic political doggerel. It reads in this way:

HUGHES AT THE CROSSROADS.

"Old Whiskers" is a speaking in the wild and sunny West, and we all were sort of wishing that he'd try to do his best.

I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will not talk while the muses are performing.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I was interrupting him.

Mr. WILLIAMS (resuming)—

"Old Whiskers" is a speaking in the wild and sunny West, and we all were sort of wishing that he'd try to do his best; so we hitched up the old buggy and we went to hear him talk, for the crossroads whar he's stopping takes a long and weary walk. Now Maw has joined the suffragettes and had to have her rights and said she'd let me go along to take in all the sights, so I had to hear the whole darned thing of Redfield and of Jones till the box that I was sitting on was rubbing on my bones.

It seems that there is not a particle of poetry in the make-up of the Senator from Pennsylvania. Listen:

That old civil-service business that PENROSE loves so well, doesn't rise to much importance when the world is smelling hell; and what are all the Joneses and the Redfields and Durant, unless a fellow's "trying to" and finds out that he can't?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator from Mississippi is the author of this poem?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Alas! No. I have no genius. I can not yield to the Senator right now—not right in the middle of a piece of poetry. Why, it would be unheard of. [Laughter.]

When he settled down to women's votes, Maw jabbed me in the side, and she jabbed a little harder when he made it Nation wide. But I saw the frown a-coming when he mentioned Mexico, and soon she made the master's sign that meant that we must go. We have a bunch of boys just like other boys, you see, but Maw once got religion and she prays for them and me; and she wouldn't give the runnings from our Andy's last stone bruise for all the Mexicans ever seen by Justice Hughes. But old whiskers keeps a-talkin'—not as well as Mr. Bryan, but you've simply got to hand it to a fellow who's a-tryin'. If his throat and lungs will stand it and they'll let him go about, he may find a living issue "if you don't watch out."

If so, whether we "watch out" or not, he will have done a heap more than you Senators have done all day to-day, when you postponed the consideration of a bill to raise the necessary revenue for the Government in order that you might make political speeches.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi has contributed his full share toward the postponement of this measure to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was merely a counterirritant.

Mr. PENROSE. I offer a resolution, which I send to the desk, and I ask to have it read and lie on the table until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 253) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That H. R. 16763 be recommitted to the Committee on Finance with instructions to amend the bill so as to raise an equitable portion of the required revenue from a protective tariff, "sufficient to protect adequately American industry and American labor, and to be so adjusted as to prevent undue exactions by monopolies or trusts"; and

With further instructions to the Committee on Finance to give special attention to securing the industrial independence of the United States, to the end that "our industries can be so organized that they will become not only a commercial bulwark but a powerful aid to national defense"; and

That the bill be further amended so as to require the tariff commission to report the difference in wages and the cost of production between foreign countries and the United States.

Mr. PENROSE. I only wish to say in connection with the resolution that the language is copied verbatim from the platform of the last national convention of the Republican Party, and I commend it to the attention of the Senator from Mississippi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the heart of the universe, the source of all life, all wisdom, all power, all love, may we drink deep of the fountain of life, widen our intellectual horizon, increase our strength by the power of resistance and in the overcoming of the evil tendencies within us, that love may have its full fruition in the bonds of brotherhood, that each heart may throb with faith, hope, love, each home become typical of the heavenly home and each nation vie with each in the great principle that he who serves best his fellow men serves best his God, that the dear old earth may blossom as the rose under the divine leadership of the world's great Exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, August 18, 1916, was read and approved.
